

HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XV. HERMANN IS IN THE AWFUL SHADOW.

This was obviously to tax her power of self-restraint to the utmost, and now it was she discovered, even to her own surprise, how great that power was.

The respectful, pleasant greeting of the inspector she also responded to, as standing by the end of the gangway he waved his hand to her as he generally did, then cast a rapid glance of his expressive eyes towards Hermann, as much as to say, "Here he is—the lover I know you have come to meet."

And there Hermann was sure enough, radiant and beaming, as with a light step he tripped across the gangway and bounded to her side, the smile of welcome on his parted lips, the ardour of love raying forth from his blue eyes, the flush of joyous excitement mantling eloquently on his ruddy cheek.

She met him with answering smile, in which he saw no lurking sadness, though her heart was cold and heavy as lead. But description was comparatively easy, for having no cause to expect trouble in her look, he thought not of directing an enquiring gaze into her countenance.

"Now, my darling," he whispered, "now for our long evening ramble."

"But have you dined?" she asked.

"Dined!" he exclaimed in a tone of affected contempt, "I dine on love."

"Not a very satisfactory substitute for bodily food, I should suppose," rejoined Helen.

"Don't I grow fat on it?" he gaily exclaimed. "Look at me; am I not plump and in prime condition?"

"I have dined, no one need be at a loss for a meal on board the Dandie. When we went up in the morning, I bespoke dinner of the steward, and on going aboard at Helmsburgh half an hour ago, I had it served piping hot, the joint done to a turn, new potatoes of the sweetest, vegetables of the freshest, and a pint of as well brewed, well coloured sherry as if it had come out of our own vats. Oh, believe me, I dined like a prince, and am good for at least four hours' fasting. But what of Edwin? has he returned from Dumoon?"

"Not when I left."

"Ha! what an enviable fellow he is, having the whole day at his command, while I can secure only the evening. He's caught, Helen—he's fairly caught! Cousin Mignon has got his heart sure and fast. He was to be off to Switzerland within a week, but I suspect Switzerland won't see him this summer. Well, I rejoice at the affection that is growing up between them. They seem to have been made for each other, their natures are so suited. He'll make her a noble husband, and I know she will make him a model wife. And what between Merton Hall and the Lessing chateau on the beautiful Rhine, their lives will be happily mixed together."

Oh, what agony it was to hear him talk on in this light gay strain, in the fullness of his buoyant and exuberant spirits, when she knew that awaited him a little way forward. A sacrificial lamb wreathed with flowers on its way to the altar was but a faint emblem of his happy light-heartedness, as arm-in-arm they went up the path towards the woods, which now densely stretched out before them.

Yet in another respect she was thankful that he kept talking so, for it drew her attention from herself, and enabled them to pass away from the vicinity of the houses with a free and unconstrained demeanour.

Thus they went on ascending higher and higher, and drawing nearer and nearer to the sad unfolding of destiny which the events of that day had prepared.

After passing through a portion of the wood whose dark pines had grown there, while the adjoining shores were destitute of habitations, and while perchance the wild deer roamed beneath their branches, the pair entered a small open glade where, the rocks having pressed through the surface, no trees could grow. It might be about a quarter of an acre in extent, the wood surrounding it on all sides, and the open space swelling into a knoll, from the raised centre of which an extensive view could be had of the river, the mountains, and the opposite coast, stretching away to the far and dim horizon.

To this highest point Hermann led his companion, and on a piece of thick soft moss they sat down to rest, to admire at leisure the magnificent prospect; and, as Hermann designed, to enjoy that sweet, hazy communion of soul which had of late been their delicious experience.

Helen, in the silence of her sinking soul, accepted it as the place where her lover must learn the fatal truth, and realize the bitterness which she had tasted. It was a suitable place for the sad and sorrowful purpose. They were all alone, entirely alone, with no probability of interruption, or of being subjects of observation to curious, unsympathizing eyes.

Hermann drew her closer to him, and passing his arm tenderly around her, thus making her task harder still.

"My darling, you are flushed and heated," he observed, as fondly he gazed into her face, crimsoned with the rash of throbbing feeling that went out from her heart. "The uphill walk has fatigued you too much, he went on." "We should have rested sooner. It was thoughtless of me to think of that."

The words of affection, the act of tenderness with which were accompanied, overcame her utterly; helplessly she sank on his bosom, and the impulse of her weary heart was to give utterance to a mournful wail. This feeling she mastered in time, and then came the thought, more agonizing still, that this was the last time they should sit together—that never again should she feel that encircling arm, or enjoy the support of that strong, manly bosom. Blame her not for a minute or two she abandoned herself to the dear enjoyment of the situation, and lay still and silent on her breathing couch.
