CHAPTER XIX.

LOVE REVEALS ITSELF—A DISAGREEABLE INTERRUPTION—THE OUTCAST.

"Be calm, Captain Gibson," said the youth, with wonderful composure "there is no occasion for this violence. I will come forth voluntarily."

He had by this time relinquished his hold of Lillias, who sank upon the seat in helpless terror, but as her father and her lover moved out, her fear for the latter's safety caused her to spring up and follow them.

If the two men expected to see George manifest the bearing of a man baffled, mortified, and overwhelmed by the discovery which had been made, they found themselves mistaken for he stood before them erect, dignified, and unabashed—his eyes meeting theirs without shrinking and the expression of his face remaining calm and self-possessed. This they attributed to a spirit of defiant insolence, and Stephen Gibson was enraged the more.

As for Nathan Garrett, he gazed at the youth with that vague, undefined, yet excessive feeling of dread which he experienced on the day of the youth's arrival, and at the first moment of beholding him, for he was again struck by a resemblance to his former master, George Morrar, and the heart which Nathan Garrett carried in his bosom was so guilty a character that an idea of this kind, even though he attributed it to mere fancy, greatly disturbed him.

"Now, you base, deceitful vagabond, what have you to say for yourself?" roared Stephen, shaking his clenched hand in George's face.

"At least this," answered George, "that I do not deserve to be called by such opprobrious names."

"Have you the impudence to say so after I have caught you thus? You brazen it out well, sir, I must say. Your conduct now is of a piece with the base attempt you have made to ensnare my daughter. None but a scoundrel of the worst description would look me in the face as you are doing after your villainy has been discovered."

"Your pardon, Captain Gibson," said George. "I am conscious of no villainy, therefore I have no occasion to feel other than unmoved before you."

"Denial is useless, sir, utterly useless, I heard sufficient before my entrance to make it impossible for you to resort to subterfuge. The detection is full, sir—full and complete."

"I have nothing to deny," returned George, "I have no need to resort to subterfuge, and detection can occur only when concealment is desired. Of what do you accuse me?"

"Of a base and wicked design upon this simple, silly girl—my daughter Lillias."

"That I do deny," answered George, firmly.

"But I tell you, you need not. I heard your words—heard them with my own ears. The lie, therefore, will not serve you."

"Oh, father," pleaded Lillias, imploringly, "George does not deserve this treatment."

"Peace, girl," roared her father, with a burst of passion. "I promise that you shall be better looked after for the future. I might have guessed something of this kind was working to cause you to object so strongly to the marriage I have settled for you. A very fortunate thing it is for you that this fellow's attempt has come to my knowledge, but dare not to add to your folly by trying to screen him. Be thankful, rather, that you are saved from ruin. Now, sir, do you still persist in your denial?"

"Most certainly I emphatically deny the charge you have brought against me," replied George. "Of a base and wicked design I am altogether innocent. That I love Lillias is true, but that I count no crime and no disgrace. To love one so fair, so noble—one adorned with every virtue and excellence—"

"Oh, spare us the rhapsody," said Stephen. "'Tis not her foolish ear into which you are now pouring that trash. You admit, then, that you have dared to love her?"

"I do."

"And yet you would deny my charge of baseness and villainy?"

"Yes, for it is neither baseness nor villainy to love as I love Lillias, and if you do not distinguish between true affection and interested passion, that is my misfortune but not my fault."

"Perhaps the young man expects you to believe that his motives are not interested," said Nathan Garrett, speaking for the first time, and that in a sarcastic tone, and with a sneer.
