

He Fell Among Thieves

One natural result of all this was a fear of again encountering the traveler. She was averse to the social subterfuges common to many of her sex, and had played by no other excuse than illness to fall back upon, and she was pledged to Lady Mabel to be the first to visit her. She had, however, no intention of doing so, and she resolved that if the meeting were unescapable, as it seemed to be, it should at least be as transitory as the could make it.

Thursday came, and with it came Lady Mabel, attired for the Archbishop's garden party. She called into Lady Mabel's room, and after a few minutes' conversation, she left her with good humor.

"My dear," she said, holding both hands behind her, and tiptoeing over the hall, "I am quite sure that you will find me to be a very good person, and I am very sorry."

He extricated her rather clumsily from the whirlwind of her hands, and she looked at him with a smile which his companion's failure excited. Harry was as unconscious as himself, for the mere contact of her hand upon his arm, though it rested there as lightly as a snowflake, filled him with a splendid exultation.

He was near to the end he had set before himself. To-morrow he would proclaim his identity to the world, and at that moment no shadow of a doubt as to the reception of him rested on his mind.

Before he well knew it they were walking alone in the half gloom of a conservatory. She was the first to discover that they had withdrawn from the crowd, and hastily removing her hand she murmured incoherently, "What is this?"

She never knew, then or afterwards, if it were terror or the assurance of an almost awful joy which shook her as she turned towards him, and her eyes met his. He was bending over her, and his look seemed to devour her.

"Intitia!" he said. She gave no answer, but his eyes fastened her. "Don't you know me?"

He caught her swiftly as she was in the act of falling. He supported her with one arm about her waist, and the other beneath her head, and she lay in his arms like a drooping flower. Her face was colorless, but there was no fear in his mind. He kissed her again and again. Her eyes opened, the color flowed back to her face, and she threw both arms about him.

"I knew it," she sobbed. "I knew it. It was impossible, and yet I knew it. For a long time they clung to each other in a silence only broken by Intitia's stifled sobs, and now and again a soothing murmur from Harry.

"I wanted to declare myself," he said, "from the first moment, but I had not the courage. When I asked me to see Lord Hounes I consented, because you were to be away. You forgive me for that?"

There was no need to ask. The clinging arms and fast flowing tears told all.

"I have strange things to tell you, darling, when you are strong enough to listen. I will not trouble you with them now."

"I am listening, dear," she answered. "Tell me everything."

He found a seat for her, and threw open the conservatory door, letting in the fresh air of the night from the garden. The moon, nearly at the full, hung low over the neighboring roofs, and its light fell beside upon her face. He seated himself beside her, and took her hands in his.
