white throat, and a fairer picture never greeted mortal vision before.

Her beautiful face was fairly radiant with happiness, her eyes bright with animation, her manner graceful and composed, as if she were perfectly at home in that brilliant assembly.

A rumor of Lord Holborn's marriage had got abroad a day or two before, and this was the gossip which had so nearly taken everybody's breath away, and which Lady Arlesbury now understood to her mortification and despair.

'Born, 'Cred Lady Ara, in a voice of satonishment. "Why, everybody has been delighted to make the acquaint-ance of her ladyship and of—"

She bent forward and whispered a few words in her ear.

"Aunt, oh! you cannot mean it!" Catherine Arlesbury cried, with a bianched and startled face.

"I not only mean it, but the matter has all been settled beyond the possibility of any mistake."

"And she the child of shame," reand which Lady Ariesbury how understood to her mortification and despair.
When the crowd around Lady Ara had parted and revealed the young couple to her, a cry of surprise and anger burst from Lady Ariesbury.
She grasped Gertrude by the arm and hissed in her ear:
"Look! that girl again!"
Gertrude had supposed that it was

She slipped quietly back out of sight, and sank into a chair to hide her white face from observation, and to escape this meeting. Her last hope had been withleady destroyed. ruthlessly destroyed.

The earl's eyes lighted and his whole face glowed with pleasure as he saw his pretty favorite once more, but he did not seem the least startled or over-come with surprise—a fact which Lady Arlesbury remarked with wonder. "It is the strangest thing in the

"My mother is unable to come out, and desired me to present her regrets," Lord Holborn said, and then turned to the earl, who shook them both the next hour, haroducing his orde and receiving congratulations.

"What does it all mean? Where did she go to? Where did he find her, and is my father, the earl, in the secret, after all? It is all a tantalizing mystery," were the exclamations and queries which broke from Lady Arlesbury and Gertrude, as they stele from the magnificant drawing agent after the look took refuge in a small ante-chamber beyond "She is destined to prove the marplot of our whole life, I believe," her lady-ship said, bitterly, and remembering how exceedingly levely Tina had looked in her fair, white robes, while she for-got that her own evil disposition was the marplot of her life.

"How does it happen that they were invited here tonight? There are very few young people here," Gertrude said.
"That is explained easily enough. Your aunt, as you know, was to have married Lord Holborn's uncle, but he was a scamp, and ran away with another woman. His—Ernest's—father and mother were good friends to her, however, and so, of course, she would extend an invitation to the family; but did you notice your grandfather when he met them?" your grandfather when he met them?"

"No," said Gertrude, faintly.
She had noticed but one thing—Lord desirous to do everything in their power to please Lady Ara, who, they knew, would not like to have her guests neglected; but they kept at a safe distance from the bridal party, determined not to recognize them by so much as a look. They grew more and more puzzled as the evening wore on, for people sought them out and congratulated them on the happy occasion, while they laughed over the sly manner in which they had conducted the whole affair.

Lord Holborn, too, they considered wonderfully clever to have won and married this beautiful woman—and a great heiress, teo, they had heard—and no one knew anything of it until now. They dare not ask any questions for fear of committing themselves; they could not understand why they should be congratulated, nor the allusions to their movements in the matter; so they listened, smiled when they thought the situation required it, and said just as little as possible, and escaped the earliest moment from their tormentors.

Lady Arlesbury had said that she wondered "what next?" and well she might, for she was destined to be still more surprised before she sought her bed that night.

the guests had nearly all departed, and the farce which they were trying to keep up was ended for the time. Lady Arlesbury thought everyone had gone, and she and her daughter went into the drawing-room from the conser-vatory, where they had fled a half-high previous, to bid Lady Ara good-night before retiring to their own room. She was not there; the room was entirely empty, and, thinking they heard voices in a small perior agrees the ball they you."

Lady Arlesbury drew herself proudly "His lordship I know already; his wife, if such she is," with a contemptuous glance at Tina, "I do not wish to know."

Ah, if Lady Arlesbury could only have realized what she was doing, how differently she would have played her cards. "Not wish to know young Lady Hol-

"And she the child of shame," retorted Lady Arlesbury, with scornful Lady Ara smiled a queer little smile, and, taking up a newspaper from a table near by, pointed to a paragraph, and gave it to her to read.

Every vestige of color faded out of the woman's face as she read the brief notice referred to. "Who has dared do this? It is utterly "Who has dared do this? It is utterly false!" she cried.
"Catherine, for a woman of your years, you are behaving in a very unseemly manner," Lady Ara said, almost sternly; "you are betraying a vindictiveness and spite unworthy a child of six years. What you have read there is not false; it is every word true. Listen to go back to that day when Tina, in her encounter with Lady Holborn, was hurled from the cliffs near Castle Demaire, and left, to all appearances, dead upon the rocks below.

One glance at her made his face grow gray as ashes, his eyes to start from his head, while his whole frame shook with terror.

But he succeeded at length in getting her into his arms, and then began a careful descent to the road.

Here he laid his burden down, to ascertain, if possible, whether anything of life remained in her. There were no bones broken that he could discover; there were no bruises on either her head, face, or hands, and, laying his hand over her heart, he found there a slight pulsation, and his face instantly lighted up with a look of triumph.

'If my pretty bird does not die, the "If my pretty bird does not die, the fates have favored me," he muttered, and lifting her once more in his arms he bore her to his carriage, which was empty, and arranging the cushions, made a comparatively comfortable couch, upon which he laid her.

AT WINDSOR. Windsor, Ont., Jan. 29.-The bonspiel is now on, and the curling rink presents a scene of ceaseless activity. In the first round Windsor clubs were pitted against Sarnia, their old opponents, while Chatham was given a chance to try conclusions with their Scotch cous-ins from Grand Rapids. The interest on the ice in the morning centered around the rinks where Windsor was contesting for supremacy. The Sarnia boys started with a rush, and it looked chilly for the home teams for several ends. Dr. Ash-baugh's rink at the half was 14 down. However, the Windsorites took a brace up, and from that time up till the last stone was curled, the result was never in doubt. Dr. Ashbough's rink was 2 up, while A. R. Bartlet's curlers had the snug majority of 12. Windsor played Chatham this afternoon in the second draw, and the finals will be played in the morning. The score:
