Accounts from Syria represent the condition of the country as worse than ever. In the interior there is no eccurity whatever either for life or property. The neighborhood of Aidin is infested by three different bands of brigands, who, without let or hindrance from the authorities, plunder houses, rob travellers and take well-to-do people captive and hold them to ransom. One village has been completely ravaged and its inhabitants despoided of all they possessed. In consequence of these disorders commerce languishes and agriculture suffers.
