

Your ability and perseverance in the performance of your labours, your untiring interest in the welfare of those under your instruction, and your gentlemanly demeanour, have assisted to elevate the University to a high position, and have endeared you to us all.

On several previous occasions, the students have evinced their appreciation of your service by presenting to you testimonials; and the time which has since elapsed has served only to increase their regard.

All of us who have enjoyed the privilege of your private acquaintance, have found in you a sincere friend and warm counsellor. Though your connection with the institution, which has profited so much under your devoted talents and fostering care, has ceased, and the relation which has existed between us, as professor and students, has been severed, we shall continue to cherish towards you the same feelings of love and respect which we have ever felt; and in what position soever you may be placed, you will bear with you our earnest wishes for the welfare and happiness of yourself and family.

Kingston, C.W., 16th February, 1864.
