A LONG LOOK INTO WALL-STREET

World Office, Wednesday, Aug. 22.

There is a seer in town, or one who purports to have a line on the distant future of the stock market. He has played the New York market for many years, and conducted a large speculating establishment in the United States until run out by the process of the law. His diagnosis of Wall-street is interesting, if not correct. Prices, according to this prophetic individual, will advance at New York from ten to one hundred points between now and the 17th of September next. Mind he is specific to the day, and, in this regard, it might be well to mention that he is equally specific as to another day. This one, however, is a long way off; too long for the ordinary speculator. The culmination of the present bull campaign, according to the seer, will be reached, as before stated, on Sept. 17, 1906. After this the deluge, and low prices will not be recorded until ten years hence, the particular day being Aug. 12, 1916. To-day gave but a very poor reception to the first prognostication, but if the guesses, miscarry, it can at least be said that he is no worse than others who have attempted to outline a future procedure for this erratic centre of security quotations.
