

THE TOLDOUSSES. Do you know the Toldosses? They are scattered far and near. In every village, town and city, you will find them...

ROSE OF VENICE; A STORY OF Love, Hatred & Remorse. BY S. CHRISTOPHERS. PART I. CHAPTER VIII.—(CONTINUED).

It was his ardent wish to have an heir, and Teresa shared this desire, as the fancied he would then become less negligent of her, or at least save appearances, as he used to do during the first years of her widowhood...

CHAPTER VIII.—(CONTINUED). 'If such be the condition of the people of this town, who have been instructed by the profession of religion, and who must be in the state of others who have never so much as beheld any of the champions of these strange dogmas? The failure that has attended the strenuous efforts of many is not surprising...

It was on this occasion that Rosalia, in crossing the Piazza St. Marco, recognized Teresa, who she had not seen for six years before, in the coach near Metra. Though she was the coachman's wife, she had no share in her wretched fate...

The first and most numerous is consequent of the fanaticism, who are consequently intolerant in the highest degree. With them adhesion to the new doctrines is the most heinous and unpardonable of crimes.

The second numbers fewer families and comprises the kind and more forgiving, who cannot persecute, and will not pass judgment on their neighbor, and who, in their agonized horror of apostasy and agnosticism, have concluded that a person who renounces the Church, and disregards her holy ordinances, is downright mad.

'I had been invited to pass a day with them, at their superb villa, on the mountains that surround the town, where they lay on the sea, Viareggio. Unexpectedly, Father Leonardo Calò, of the Franciscan Order, was announced. By birth he belongs to the house of the Medici, but his reputation for sanctity, his many schemes for promoting the spiritual, moral, and temporal welfare of the poor under his episcopal jurisdiction, and his various other good works, had raised him to the rank of a saint.

her mother's, and her father's. When she had attained her sixteenth year symptoms of an alarming nature manifested themselves in her loving mother, and her physician, desiring to avoid the responsibility of treating a disease which so often ends fatally, insisted on her removal to the healthier and warmer climate of Pisa.

CHAPTER IX. DEATH-SED ADVICE. A few months after the mysterious disappearance of the Duke of the Ombroglia, the old physician, Paolo Ombroglia, relinquished wealth and title, and was gathered to his fathers. Marco was now under one man's control; he no longer feared displeasing Teresa, and calmly she accepted her share of the inheritance...

One beautiful afternoon, while Rosa was receiving some young friends, Teresa fancied she could not enjoy a drive alone. She entered her carriage, elated by the sensation of returning health, and musing on her child's fate, had arrived half-way down the Via St. Maria, when the horse suddenly became restive, and disengaging bit and bridle, fell past the hospital towards the wide and shady walk of the Casino.

CHAPTER X. A STORM. Instead of returning to the Venetian States, after Teresa's demise, Marco and Rosa rented a beautiful villa on the hills of Pistoia, passing the winter of 1845 in that beautiful spot. And truly and deeply did Rosa mourn her mother's loss.

During the first days after her death, Marco felt remorse for his neglect of his poor wife, and his carelessness about the horses, but it soon passed away, and when Christ came, he removed with his daughter to Lucca for the winter. The palace they inhabited was near the cathedral, and thither Rosa daily repaired to see her father, and to the famous sanctuary of the Volto Santo.
