When he came to take the wraping off the top he found that it was ightly nailed down on the under side, and appealed to his mother who sent for the screw driver and then showed him how to insert it in over the paper in such a way that it couldn't mark the table, he reached for it with eyes alight. "No, I guess I'd better do this myself," she said Re refusing his reaching hand, and the p light went out. He had been so interested and now when there was something a little different for him to master, the chance was taken away from him. True, he might not have been able to do it. But he could not have hurt the table, and chances of his hurting C himself were infinitely small (much smaller than when he goes to school across two busy auto-filled streets) and it would not have done the slightest harm to let him try.

I think this is a mistake we often make with our children. We don't let them try new things, and thus we reduce the tasks that we ask of them | be to a hated monotony.
