Arthur shivered slightly as he began to unfold this, although he could not have told why he did so. He hesitated in the act, and glanced with some trepidation about him, as if he almost expected to find someone —perchance the spirit of this lovely woman upon whom he had just been gazing—coming forth from the shadows that lurked in the corners of the room, to denounce him for his meanness and treachery.

Then, with an impatient shrug of his shoulders, he resolutely unfolded the document and began to read it. As he did so, every atom of color died out of his face-even out of his lips. His eyes grew wild and large with fear and fierce with hate; his lips were set in a firm line of anger, and a violent trembling rangover his whole frame.

For a long time he sat thus, staring at that paper, as if his mental powers failed to grasp the meaning of its contents. "Curse him!" at length he cried, and the words came forth from his white lips with startling vehemence. Then he hastily refolded the paper. though his hands shook in the act till it rattled in his grasp.

He carefully replaced it where he had found it, laid back the scrap of silk and the nut-brown har, smoothed the velvet pad over all, and pressed it firmly down in its place. He tried not to see that weet face looking up at him from the opposite side of the case, but those lovely brown eyes seemed to follow his every movement as if they were instinct with life, and it was with a feeling of relief that he at last closel the case and returned it to the tray where he

He then replaced the jewe cases exactly as he had found then, shut the cover of the till, relocking it; then, after sharply regarding the contents of the chest to see that everything was in its proper place, he closed the lid, locking that also, and then shoved his bunch of skeleton keys into the depths of one of his pockets, while a look of relief swept over his face, as if he was glad that his dirty piece of work was

A dark and troubled look rested on his face—a look that meant no good; it was fierce, cunning, resolute. He stood there, lost in thought, for several minutes; then turning away from the calm beauty of the morning without, he sought his own chamber where, throwing himself upon his bed, he soon fell into a profound slumber.

That same morning, as Louis Dunbar was on his way from his apartments to his office, he was suddenly startled by finding his pathway blocked by the figure of a man.

Looking up, he found himself face to face with Louis Murray-the man who, three or four years before, had claimed him as his son. "You here in Paris!" the young man exclaimed, while his heart sank with-"Yes, I am here in Paris. You didn't mean that your fond father should know whither his son had departed, did you?" was the mocking response

"I took no pains to conceal my actions from anyone," Louis answered. "Ah ves: I should have remembered that my son is always open and aboveboard in all his dealings," Mr. Murray retorted sarcastically, adding: "But you perceive that my affection for you so strong that I was forced to follow you even across the ocean."

"Do I understand that was your object in coming to Paris-to follow me?" 'Exactly.

"Well, what else?"

"Ahem! I knew you had obtained a very lucrative position; being hard up myself, I naturally supposed you'd be

"I am obliged to tell you, then, that you will be sadly disappointed. I will find you something to do, if you like; but as for having you fasten yourself upon me and then lead the kind of life that you led in Boston, I tell you at the outset that I will not have it."

The man scowled darkly.
"You're a very affectionate son, now, aren't you?

"No, sir, I do not think I am," Louis frankly admitted. "I am free to confess that I entertain very little of either affection or respect for you. Still, I am not heartless; if the same blood flows in our veins, I would not be unmindful of the fact, nor undutiful, if you were suffering and needed my aid. And I say now that I will get work for you if you will do it."
"I won't, curse you! I want money!" retorted the man, fiercely.

'Haven't you any?" "Five francs."

Louis thought a moment. "I will pay your passage back to America and give you a hundred dol-lars. Will you go?" he proposed at

"No!" was the angry response, accompanied with a fearful oath. "Very well; then you will please look after your own interests," Louis very coolly replied; and, stepping aside, passed on his way without looking to the right or left, while the baffled man behind him sent a torrent of abuse and invective after him, vowing he would make him eat humble-pie for his impudence before he was six months older.

CHAPTER XVII.

Mr. Forest's business detained him at Havre for several days, during which time Arthur occupied his time much as usual in seeking his own pleasure. But he did not appear to be in as good spirits as usual; something seemed to worry and depress him, although he strove to conceal it from his killed his companion moose in a fight, friends, and at times assumed a has just succumbed to galloping congayety, which, even to them, seemed sumption. forced and unnatural.

One day, shortly after the return of Mr. Forest, Mrs. Houghton arranged of the Silica Barytic Stone Company, for a trip to Versailles. Mr. Forest and Arthur were invited to join the party, also Louis and some young friends of Mrs. Parker, and Ada, and the merry company started forth one bright morning, all eager to visit that wonderful palace, around which there clusters so much of thrilling romance and tragedy.

The day was perfect, and the tenmile drive over the lovely roads was one never to be forgotten. They reached the royal palace about noon, having stopped on the way thither to view the ruins of St. Cloud, once the magnificent and favorite residence of young lady has been a frequent suffer-Napoleon Third; and here they roamed at pleasure through its marble halls, its vast apartments, and galleries of every description.

Thence to Le Grand Trianon, where Napoleon resided with Josephine, and where he conceived the infamous plan inordinate ambition.

From there they went to La

Trianon, the charming residence of the ill-fated Queen Marie Antoinette, then to the royal stables, where, in empty and silent state, stand the elegant ponderous vehicles once used for the pleasure of the imperial household.

Then came a stroll through the beautiful park, adorned with magnificent walks winding through romantic grottoes, beneath the shadows of mossgrown rocks and along the margins of rippling streams, or the shores of quiet and beautiful lakes, and through groves of orange and myrtle and pine.

To our young lovers, Louis and Margaret, this was a day of unalloyed delight; but to Margaret the beauties of the park were less interesting than the curiosities within the palace, and finally telling Mrs. Houghton that they were going back to the picture gallery in Le Petit Trianon, they slipped away unobserved by the rest of the party, found a guide to whom they made known their desire, and were soon deep in the study of those rare and beautiful pictures that adorn the walls of that lovely villa.

During a tour of the main gallery they came upon a picture, evidently the portrait of a remarkably lovely voman, which they had not noticed before.

She was young, scarcely twenty, one would judge, and a vision that once seen could never be forgotten.

A beautifully shaped head was set somewhat proudly upon a pair of graceful shoulders; a wealth of rich brown hair was gathered back from a pure white forehead, save a few delicate rings which lay lightly upon it; the eyes were large, dark and liquid, and seemed to hold one with an expression which was difficult to fathom. The nose was small, the nostrils peculiarly delicate: the smiling mouth was arch, yet wondrously sweet and tender,
