On that occasion or none other had she thrown a glass of water at Mr. Currey. She never had said "I will kick the damn stomach out of you," or had she kicked him. It was the first she had ever heard of it when she read Mr. Currey's evidence. After she had returned to the city in September 1917 Mr. Currey's conduct became worse. His conduct was unbearable. In fact with scoundrel. He continually accused her of doing things she had never done. It was about this time she slept in a separate room. On the night of the 20th of September, at the death of her father, she heard Mr. Currey answering the telephone telling of the death. He came up to their room and sat on the bed and said "Your father is dead." She was grief stricken and wanted to go right on, but Mr. Currey held her back and said "I will be in an hour, but he had no money with him, and could not get it in time. She said, "May I take my children with me?"
