MR. W. D. EULER ON THE BALLOT MANIPULATION

Last Wednesday Mr. W. D. Euler spoke in connection with the motion of the Opposition Leader for an investigation into the mysterious Meighen telegram with reference to placing soldiers' votes in doubtful ridings:

The Meighen Telegram.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House has elicited a most remarkable speech from the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Meighen). The feature of that speech which attracted my attention most particularly was the enunciation of a new code of political morals which must come with a shock to the moral sense of the people of Canada. The motion of the Leader of the Opposition is based upon a certain telegram purporting to have been signed and sent by the Minister of the Interior to the Prime Minister of Canada in December 1917 while the Dominion elections were in progress. That telegram is dated at Winnipeg, and reads as follows:

Would like one thousand soldier votes at large for Manitoba, of which 300 for Selkirk, balance divided between Provencher, Macdonald, and Springfield, or some proportion of division no matter what our allotment may be.

What does the telegram mean on the face of it? Does it mean that the Minister of the Interior is merely expressing a desire that the Prime Minister should supply him with a thousand votes or so, which might be thrown into any constituency in which the Opposition candidates appear dangerous, or in which their election seemed probable? It means more than that.

Votes Ready to Distribute.

There is no doubt whatever that it indicates that there was a stock of votes somewhere that was at the disposal of Unionist candidates. That presumption is borne out by the very significant word "allotment" in the telegram. That word "allotment" implies that there is a supply of a certain commodity on hand which may be drawn upon at the will or discretion of those who wish to avail themselves of it. I am quite sure that none of the members are so credulous or innocent as to imagine that anything else was meant than that there was an allotment of votes which could be used practically at will to defeat any candidate of the Opposition who seemed likely to win the election.

I had thought that possibly the Minister of the Interior would disclaim all responsibility for sending the telegram, but he did not do so. I did not believe, however, that he would actually justify the sending of a telegram of that kind or the object that it sought to attain, which was nothing less than to defeat the will of the people. When the Minister of the Interior says that is was a perfectly lawful proceeding that these votes of the soldiers should be applied to, to use his own cynical expression, where they would do the most good, I did not think he would also justify it by any contention that it was a right and decent and proper thing to do in a democratic country. The Minister does not deny sending the telegram. He does not remember that he sent it, but he does say that the Prime Minister did not receive the telegram. After all that has no very great significance in view of the fact that the Minister claims that it was a perfectly lawful and proper proceeding.

Cannot Forget Some Things.

I was disappointed at the attitude of the hon. member of Red Deer (Dr. Clark) in his speech on the resolution. It is his view that it is well to forget all, to bury the matter altogether. I cannot see eye to eye with him; I cannot understand his position. Perhaps it should be remembered that it is the traditional practice of the members of the medical profession to disguise as quickly as possible to bury their mistakes, say, about six feet deep, in preference to calling in the coroner to investigate and establish the wrong-doing if such there be. I was still more disappointed when, throughout the whole of his speech, he gave the impression that he subscribed to the vicious doctrine that the end justifies the means. I contend that that is what his speech implies.

While he admitted—perhaps not in so many words—that things which had taken place during the election were not just what they should have been, yet, after all, he took the position that they had brought about the desired result and that all was well. I do not believe in the policy of hushing up matters, nor in the doctrine of forgetting. Then may we expect this country to enter upon an era of corruption such as has never been known. I venture to say that there never was a government, bad as it may have been, that did not believe that it was about the best government the country ever had. It necessarily follows that, believing that the end justifies the means, that they will naturally act upon that principle and adopt any plan whatever that may bring them back into power. Surely the hon. gentleman does not desire that.

The hon. member also stated that that which was irrevocable might as well be forgotten and the dead past be permitted to bury its dead. I do not subscribe to that policy in all cases. If that is a good principle to follow then we might as well abolish the criminal law entirely. If the man who slays his fellow man shall be allowed to escape simply because the life of his victim cannot be restored to the body, then, I say, we may as well do away with our criminal law altogether. It is not difficult to imagine the results which will flow from the policy that exposure and punishment shall no longer follow wrong-doing.

It may be well under some circumstances to let bygones be bygones. Perhaps some of the things which have been discussed in this House might very well be treated in that way. But, Sir, when a shameful wrong has been perpetrated upon the Canadian people, when their constitutional rights have been set at defiance, when a minister of the Crown practically glorifies in what has been done and attempts to make wrong appear right, black appear white, then I think it is the duty of the Canadian Parliament to disavow the wrong that has been done and to reaffirm its belief in the principles of democratic and responsible government.

Defeat Will of People.

We have heard a good many startling revelations since the election of 1917 as to how the election was won by the Union Government. We have heard of perjury, subornation of perjury, personation, plural voting and the coercion of soldiers. I think every member of this House could add his quota of evidence to the charges that have been made in regard to that election. I do not propose to go into these details but to confine myself very largely to the attitude that was taken by the minister in regard to the legality and propriety of the placing of soldier votes. The minister states that the telegram in itself implied nothing that was not perfectly lawful. If that is the case it means that it was legal in this country to use certain votes that were cast by non-Canadians in an election to defeat the will of the bona fide Canadian people in the various constituencies and that the Government could destroy its opponents at will. If that be true then the law is a great deal worse than I thought it.

According to my reading of the Military Voters Act it was entirely the duty of the voter himself to designate where his vote should be placed. There was no provision whatever that he should vote by proxy or that he should assign his vote to some one else, not even the Union Government. Yet on the face of that telegram there can be no reasonable doubt that these votes were appropriated to use at the behest of the Union Government committee. That argues such a departure from what, in my opinion is fair, just and decent, that it strikes at the very vitals of democratic institutions.

I hope, Sir, that I am not Pharisee enough to claim higher standards of conduct than those of the ordinary good citizen who has a definite code which he lives up to in a more or less successful way. I assuredly make no such pretence. But, after all, such a broad and well defined line runs between what is essentially right and what is essentially wrong, that it is incomprehensible how men can mistake one for the other.

I stated a moment ago that if the law gave the right to any other than the man who actually voted to place that vote where he desired, then the law was a good deal worse than I had thought. The Minister of the Interior the other day in his address made the statement that the Opposition through their representative overseas had striven to give the impression that all soldier votes could be placed wherever the Government desired. I do not know whether or not that is the case but I do know that a similar impression was in the mind of at least one member sitting on the other side of the House. I will give the instance with which I am most familiar. Shortly after the election of 1917, and during the first session of this Parliament, I had the pleasure of a conversation with an hon. member on the other side of the House. We discussed the election. During the course of the conversation he made the statement that both the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition had the undoubted right to place the soldiers' votes wherever they pleased. I thought at first, Mr. Speaker, that he said it as a joke and I said so, but he adhered to what he had said.

He stated, "I can prove it, because our organizer came to me and said, 'Mr. So and So, how many soldier votes do you want?' I told him I wanted about two or three hundred." I have no doubt that he got them. Now, Sir, I would not speak of that if it were not for the fact that it is evidence of the comprehensive plan whether the minister based his statement that the procedure as outlined in that telegram was perfectly legal or anything else but what is in the Act itself. It may be, Sir, that among the multitudinous Orders in Council which have gone forth from the Union Government there is an order which makes it legal to treat those votes in that manner; I do not know.

Remove all Opposition Candidates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what did it mean if it was lawful that those votes could is indispensable to a comfortable shave.

 First saturate your brush, squeeze half an inch of Mennen's
 SHAVING CREAM on it. Then go to it!

Immediately a soft, luxurious lather spreads over your face.
 Don't rub it in with your fingers.

That's unnecessary and messy.
 Just lather well with your brush—that's what your brush is for.

Your beard is immediately softened and rendered easy to cut.
