With two short dingy oars they made shift to steer, and then came the crowning catastrophe, the discovery that their dingy which had not been securely made fast, was adrift. As it was impossible to steer after it they perforce had to let it go and had the satisfaction of seeing a southbound vessel pick it up. And so they limped into port yesterday afternoon, where repairs to the broken rudder stem were quickly made at the Foundry, though owing to the state of the tide it was late last night before they were able to ship it again.
