Rev. S. H. Gray Preached on Local Option on Sunday.

Dundas, Dec. 13.-In Knox Church on Sunday morning, Rec. S. H. Gray preacheth on local option. The announcement that this would be his subject brought out a good full congregation. At the outset the speaker expressed his gratifihearers were men—fair-minded men, of good standing in the community. He agreed with an old Scotch—agthority, that the pulpit was not the place for discussing public questions generally, but the sedays, when the liquor traffic was on trial in all parts of the Christian world, a minister who failed publicly accusable of cowardice. No man acting from selfish motives is wise, neither can the selfish person enjoy the really good in life. Further, the wise action intellect and reason, and there could be no progress without reasonable and intelligent study of God's law. How many will cast their vote for local option simply because the propositions.

The measure had done uncalcula to the small, well-shaped foot that rested on the carpet. "H'm!" he said, with an odd little dry like, "I don't think it took me as many months as I have of years' knowledge of you to find that out. This does not imply that hotels shall be closed or that people shall not use liquor for necessary purposes. This is the only law on the statute books to check the ravages of an open bar.

The second objection was that local option is a measure promulgated by cranks and extremists. But the belief that the barroom was productive of enormous evil and without any good whatever, was not the sole contention of cranks. Great statesmen, students of social conditions, and others desirous of doing good agreed that the bar and the drinking uses it fostered were evil and evil only.

The third and most potent objection to the measure was that it deprived dealers and others of their means of livelihood and this many were loth to livelihood and this many were loth to do. But when it comes to a choice between the bar and the home, can there be any question of choice?

The last reason urged against abolishing the bay was that it would injure the town's business. But those who thus contend have entirely failed to produce reliable evidence that this has been the effect where bars have been closed. All reliable reports were entirely to the contrary. Last summer he had made personal enquiries as to the good or evidences of local option. Orilla was chosen as the place for making these enquiries. An old college chum, a barrister, was first called upon. He was asked to give his unbiased opinion of the workings of the act. The friend promptly replied that he had voted against the measure, but he would have to give a specified report as there was no other the small well-shaped foot that restricted the place of the small well-shaped foot that restricted the small well-shaped foot that restricted the place of the small well-shaped foot that restricted the place of the small well-shaped foot that restricted they let me drown? CHAPTER IV.

The evening of the day after Captain Sebright's visit, Mrs. Errington herself unconsciously gave her host an easy opening for propounding his wishes.

"Doctor Clifford," she said, "I am quite strong again, and I cannot any longer intrude on your generous hospitality. To-morrow, please, I must go to London."

Te girls cried out:

"Oh, no—ne?"

He looked at them, and instantly though of Sebright's expression, "that determined way of hers."

"Want to look for another berth, eh?" said Clifford, leaning his arm on the said Clifford, leaning his arm on the table.

"I shall have to directly, certainly," answered Christine, smiling.
"Ah! I suppose you wouldn't care for a situation that made England—London—its headquarters?"
"I should not mind it at all," she said, quite unsuspecting his drift, "if it were one I could take. There are one or two of my former emplyoyers to whom I can refer."

of my former emplyoyers to whom I can refer."

"Very good; that simplifies matters. To be plain and to the point, Mrs. Errington, it is myself and my two girls I am thinking of. I sometimes want the assistance of a secretary, and the girls need a married lady as a companion and chaperon, to walk, ride, drive with them, take them to amusements, into society, and assist. Mimic to play hostess in home society. In fact, be like a married elder sister. She and Blanche are only nineteen and twenty, you see, and only left governess and masters this autumn. They are on life's threshold, at the age to be spreading their wings, while I am fifty, and beginning to fold mine; and if you would come to us, I fancy we should all pull very well in the same boat."

Mimic could contain her joy no longer. She jumped up, threw herself on her knees before Christine, and fairly embraced her siender waist.

"Oh! how jolly! Ah, you must—must say yes, Mrs. Errington!"

Christine's dark eyes had sparkled, and her soft cheeks flushed while the doctor spoke, and now she stooped and kissed the lovely girl at her feet with

"You are very, very kind, Dr. Clifford. But surely I am—you must think me too young for such a responsible position."

"No, I don't," said Roland Clifford, brusquely. "I don't want a frump for my children's friend. I want a woman, young, clever, faithful, with a heart as well as brains—a woman of the world, who knows when to loose reins, and when to draw them in. Come on trial, at any rate, and if either party finds it a failure, we can part company. I'll pay you a handsome salary, and write to your references at once. I can't speak or act more fairly, can I?"

"No, indeed—no, indeed, Dr. Clifford," said Christine, earnestly. "I accept your

"Why, yes, Dr. Clifford. For one thing, I have no clothes here at all, save these," said Mrs. Errington, smiling, "and I must go to our shipping office, and report myself in accordance with Captain Sebright's letters. Yes, I must go, please, to my lodging. I will give you all the addresses."

"And I, mine. Mimie, my desk, dear."

But that night, alone in her room, that handsome woman stood before the mir-ror, pale as death, and wrung her hands more besides."

The other laughed and shrugged his shoulders.
"Thanks—a compliment—with the barsinister through it. Anything more, in a small way, while we're on that subject?"

"Yes. On my word, this evening I do not know whether I am most amused, most aghast or most angry with you."

"Be all three, if you like, Ken," returned the unmoved Falconer, stroking the soft, drooping moustache that shaded his lip. "I don't care; though, for the life of me, I can't see why you're so down on me this time. I told you when I came in, that I only wanted two thousand pounds before I go down to Newmarket."

"Only!" repeated Moriey, leaning one arm on the large office secretaire at which he sat. "For which chance you get suitable interest, remember," suggested the younger man, with a sareastic curve of the haughty lip, and a quick flash in the dark eyes. "The advantage isn't all on my side, is it? Also, you hold heavy insurance on my life, the premiums of which half absorb my uncle's allowance. Also, as I have, in the long run, both skill and a lucky hand at le jeu and on the turf (though I don't care so much the turf (though I don't care so much if I don't—poul!—over it goes into the capital, to stand against me. "I am sorry for your 'leeling,' then, since I feel absolutely inclined to indorse the said theque and sign the necessary bill belonging to the same. "But I will, then!" said Morley.
"But you won't!" returned the other.

"You ask that! Are there not heir-

"You ask that! Are there not heiresses—rich widows? Marry, man, marry?" retorted the money-lender, covertly watching the "handsome sinner."
He saw him start slightly, and wince as if the sharp point of a weapon had touched his breast; but he said, with a bitter, cynical laugh:
"Thank you for nothing, Ken. Who

"There's a woman at the bottom of that, of course," said Morley, shrewdly. "There's a woman at the bottom of most men's lives, isn't there?" retorted the younger man, with a passionate movement of the slender right hand to his brow that made the costly diamond ring upon it flash a dazzling ray across the money-lender's eyes. "There is mis-ery and wrong enough without my pilmg up more."

Morley glanced sharply at him, and said, beginning to fill up the papers before him:

"Well, well, but still you're young,

"You have saved life at the deadly risk of your own—in face of its almost certain loss."
"That's nothing; I have done that a good many times in my career; there's no merit in risking a life one does not care to keep. And, by the way, I never told you even as much."
"I hear, or notice, little things, you see," returned the money-lender, smiling, "and others I put two and two together. For instance, that wreck off Brighton last September—over eight months ago. I knew that you were at Brighton that week, and came up to town the very morning after—for you came to me to meet a bill. I knew you well—that you would be out in the gale

"I declare Mr. Falconer St. Maur, you are the coolest, most audacious scamp that ever lived!"

"My good fellow, have you only just found that out?" said the other, opening wide a pair of great dark eyes veiled by long, dark lashes.

Kenton Morley raised his bright eyes, and scanned the speaker, from the mass of wavy locks, all

"Golden where the sunlish."

St. Maur laughed slightly.

"Yes, I did; and perhaps I did her no service after all; who knows?"

"You do, perhaps," said Morley, lifting his keen eyes suddenly and straight to the handsome face.

Falconer met the gaze as straightly.

"No, I don't," he said, coolly. "I read your thought, and if it had been correct, you would not have trapped me.

"They say there is no fool like an old fool, and only on that ground can it be, I suppose, that I have let you get round some ungarded, soft corner long ago, and keep your hold. Heaven only knows why I like you, for I'm sure I do not!"

"I'm yery certain I don't!" said Falconer, gazing on the speaker in utter surprise, but with an instant softening of eye and lip that was almost in itself some light key-note to the riddle. "I had not even the least idea that you had any such liking for me, but I am grateful for it. Thanks!"

There was a courteous grace in the last words all his-own.

The money-lender smiled, and began unlocking one of the secretaire drawers before him.

"Why don't you get clear of all this vortex, St. Maur?"
