slowly, comparatively, and our efforts have been seen, in many respects, as concentrating very much on language; as if it were, you know, the only solution to the whole question of Quebec Nationalism.

Language is a very important element in the question. It is a basic question of Social justice, in our opinion. But it is far from being the end all and be all of our situation in Canada, vis-a-vis French Canada, in particular.

10 There has been discussion about re-distribution 11 of powers under our Constitution--between Federal and 12 Provincial Governments; and all that.

In terms of the French speaking community in Canada, I would like to think that it is not so much a redistribution of powers between governments--as the sharing of power between the two large linguistic groups. And the fact is that you have a French speaking society -- particularly in Quebec -- that has come of age; that has come into modern times in the early Sixties, very, very quickly. We have gone through a big socio-economic revolution; and the fact is that the instrument that we could use, as French Canadians, for that promotion, and that "revolution", was, essentially, the provincial state.

The private sector was one in which we, as French Canadians, were not very present. As a matter of fact,
