Quite apart from its religious significance there is no other historical enon to be compared for a moment in interest with the ever-growing wonder of the Jewish race. The light falls clearly and steadily on its history from the very first, and the whole connected story lies before us like a mighty river whose winding like a mighty river whose winding course can be traced from its foundation in the mountains in the far misty distance. We read that during eighteen centuries the Jew has had no country, scepter or home, and yet behind every throne in Europe he has stood silent, immobile, supreme. He hold no sword, yet, as a financier, his word has made war or established peace. He has held the key of the money chest of czar, kaiser and king. And he has witnessed a fulfillment of that promise given to Abraham and repeated to Jacob, "Kings shall come out of thee."

Apparently great results. "What is that in thy hand, Shamgar?" Merely an ox-goad with which he urged on his lazy animals.

Yet, used for God, Shamgar's ox-goad defeated the Philistines. Suppose he had refused to use it because he considered it too crude, small or Ill-suited to the work for God's people; no victory would have resulted and stood to his everlasting credit. There is not a department of modality, virile, aggressive, triumphant. Yet with all these wonderful qualities he still remains in each land an exile, and in every place an alien, though undoubtedly loyal to his adopted country. All this strangely contradictory life is foretold in the Bible. It declares his pre-eminence and his captivity, and that he is at once chosen and rejected. He is, therefore, a living witness to the truth of the sacred scriptures and of the predictions vet to be wrought out. Hence, it is not surprising that when the Emperor Frederick William asked one of his ministers what he considered to be the best evidence of the truth of Christianity, he replied: "The Jews, your majesty." Intelled, the Jew has rightly been called "the miracle of history," for no one can study the facts of his past and present without new confidence in the word of God, for of all the great peoples that have risen and fallen, the Hebrew alone passes each vicissitude the same, and whether upon the throne of dominion or an exile without counwrought out. Our most trivial influence to be effective? their proper use, in line with the di-vine plan. The word "trivial" must be understood comparatively. In one sense there is nothing trivial in the realm of human life and action in which events and deeds are not iso-lated, but are links in a long chain of lated, but are links in a long chain of succeeding results. When Christ said is laid every gift and grace in every resignify the meanness or insignificance of any of his people, but rather their comparative obscurity and feebleness. But we have learned that "the field is the has been convicted of murder in the world" and every Christian church is first degree.

How may our trivial possessions produce fruit and become really useful? The world often opposes us even as Pharoah withstood Moses; but the lat-ter succeeded; and if, as the Apostle James exhorts, we but take Moses for an example we can learn how we also may be greatly useful. You ask me how? Pardon me, if I answer your question by asking another. "What is that in thy hand?" For Moses' rod is but one expressed. but one example of how God has used apparently great results.
