The Pride of Llewellyn

"Law, no," replied the bride. "These now, you see, Gladys has no objection no more than I have. And besides—a marriage should be a public ceremony, not a private one. Let the folks come and see mine, if it does them good. I told the sexton so."

"Always a fool!" muttered Mrs. Llewellyn to herself. By this time they had reached the space in the front of the altar, at which stood the officiating clergyman, book in hand.

The little party soon arranged itself. The clergyman opened the book and commenced the ceremony. The bride was as calm and as cold as the "snow maiden." The bridegroom was a little fidgety as though troubled by reminiscences of the former marriage ceremony.

Mrs. Llewellyn stood a little in the rear of the party, outwardly composed, but inwardly agitated, and all the while watching through the corner of her eye the crowd that had pushed its way into the aisles of the church, as if she dreaded an interruption from some of them. When the minister reached that critical part of the ceremony which had proved so fatal to her plans on a former occasion, and as he read and as he again read the passage: "If any man can show just cause why they may not be joined together let him now speak, or else hereafter forever hold his peace," and while he made the usual pause, she held her breath in guilty dread.

The pause was not interrupted, however. The bridegroom and his lady mother breathed freely. And the ceremony proceeded prosperously toward its close.

When however the right moment came for the groom to place the ring upon the finger of the bride, that transaction required some little shifting of position. And thus it was that, in turning his back to present her ungloved left hand to the bridegroom the bride stood suddenly face to face with the hood-carrier!

Magnetized by what he gazed upon he had unconsciously elbowed his way through the crowd toward the scene of action, and now stood obtrusively near the actors and face to face with the bride!

As one struck with sudden madness by the sight of the dead raised from the grave, for one supreme moment Gladys watched with athen cheeks and parted lips and dilated eyes staring at the apparition, and then with one wild agonized, unearthly shriek, she cried, "Arthur!" threw up her arms, and fell forward in a deadly swoon.

"So help me Bob, if I didn't know it! I said that fellow would turn up at last!" cried Mr. Stukely, breaking out into schoolboyish expletives more expressive of vexation than alarm as he dived to the floor to lift the fallen bride.

At the same instant the "fellow" whom Mr. Stukely had alluded stunk away, as if frightened by the effects his presence had produced, and made his escape through the crowd.

By this time all was confusion. The bridegroom, the minister, and the lady were all kneeling upon the floor around the swooning bride.

"So help me, Bob, I knew it was going to be this way!" said the bridegroom, as he stooped and lifted the twice lost bride in his arms.

Led on by the sexton, who opened the doors and showed the way, he easily carried her into the vestry-room, where he laid her on the sofa.

Mrs. Llewellyn and the minister followed, and the crowd pressed after them.

But the minister would on no account allow them to pass the threshold of the vestry-room, the door of which he closed upon them.

And so there was no one left in the room with Gladys but her own immediate party.

Mrs. Llewellyn stood at the head of the sofa, bathing the face of the charge with eau de Cologne. When the minister approached she said to him: "You must have been very much astonished, sir, by the scene you have just witnessed."

"I was, madam," he answered. "It was—extraordinary!" exclaimed Mr. Stukely.

"It was sir!" agreed the minister. "Hold your tongue, James Stukely!" said his mother, in a fierce whisper. Then turning to the minister, she said aloud: "Now that we are alone, sir, I may inform you that my young friend here has suffered very severe bereavements in the loss of her father, her mother, and a young companion who was as dear to her as a brother. These losses have so affected her mind as to leave her in a very nervous and hysterical condition. This morning, the accidental resemblance of an individual present in the crowd that pressed into the church to witness the marriage, to a deceased young friend of her own who died under peculiarly distressing circumstances, excited and over whelmed and occasioned this swoon."

The minister bowed and bowed to everything the lady said. But the more she explained, the less he understood.

The bridegroom meanwhile, stood at the feet of his bride, making himself as passively useful as a table or a stand might do, by holding bottles, glasses pocket handkerchiefs, fans and everything else that was thrust into his hands and muttering to himself: "Extraordinary!"

And then inconsistently enough, breaking out in childish style: "Blest if I didn't know how it was going to be all the time!"

Sometimes Mrs. Llewellyn caught his eye, and in common parlance, "gave him a look" which would silence him for a few seconds.

At length, as all their efforts to restore Gladys to consciousness proved unavailing, Mrs. Llewellyn looked up from her task and said:
