

1. The first step in the process of the formation of the new state is the declaration of independence. This is a formal statement by the people of the state that they are no longer part of the British Empire and that they are now a free and sovereign nation. This declaration is usually made by a representative body of the people, such as a parliament or a congress, and is often accompanied by a declaration of the reasons for the independence.