Milking Short-horns in Demand

A feature of the trade in milk cows at the Chicago Stock Yards, and in all the region tributary to that great market, is the demand for large cows of the milking Short-horn type. These cows, showing plenty of size, are eagerly bought at long prices by the dealers from New York and Pennsylvania. Newly calved, or well along in calf, such cows elicit the strongest competition. The dealers explain the demand for them by saying that as the eastern dairymen no longer makes any attempt to rear his own heifers into profit, he must have something that will yield a remunerative flow of milk for a time and then fatten readily into beef that brings a good price. This combination is found in the Short-horn type of cow, which is brimful as much as any other sort of distinctive dairy breeding. This looks like more indisputable evidence that the Short-horn of the cornbelt can make money by paying more attention to the use of good Short-horn bulls and developing the dual-purpose character inherent in the breed—Breeders' Gazette.
