

New Cattle Food

Prof. Oscar Erl, Professor of Dairying at the Kansas State Agricultural College, is credited with having invented a process by which buttermilk is dried and prepared for cattle food. It is said to contain twice as much protein as cottonseed meal, and is manufactured at less cost. This may not be good news for the hog, nor the packing-houses that are constantly crying out for larger supplies of swine but if it makes available protein in a palatable form, cheaper than heretofore, dairymen who buy feed may welcome the invention.

Of this sum, $5,512 is given in the breeding classes; also in every breeding class, medals are given for sweepstakes best horse and mare. In the Clydesdale section there is a special class for stallions owned by non-importers, the prizes for which amount to $140. In the Shire classes, the Shire Horse Society of England give two gold medals, valued at $50 each, for the best stallion or entire colt and the best mare or filly. In all the classes but a very few, four prizes are given. Entries close on Saturday, August 3rd.

Production of the Bacon Hog in England

The following taken from a leading English Agricultural Exchange shows concisely the methods adopted by an English farmer in feeding pigs so as to produce the high class bacon for which they are justly famed.

"While there is no kind of animal more liable to fluctuations, pigs generally pay as well as any class of stock a farmer keeps, and there is nothing more generally appetising than bacon, which is one of the kinds of food of which an Englishman never tires. It is never out of season, and is often more appreciated in the summer months than anything else, so we may consider it properly as a standard dish. Breeder, feeder, and consumer like a pig that will come into early maturity, with an aptitude to fatten, and when killed will produce most flesh of a choice sort for making the best of bacon; so that the class of pig kept should be selected with these objects in view.

A good open warted does better than a sty for pigs after weaning, until required for shutting up for feeding or bringing their pigs, and when the latter time approaches, the best sty for them is part open with the bed under cover. They should be moderately fed on oatmeal or pollard and water, with ordinary wash, or a few shovels ground after boiling, taking great care not to give them any long straw for litter. Some wheat cavin is better than anything else, and when having pigs they should not be disturbed by anyone going near, so that the mother is not excited and the young lean on.

As the pigs get on to a month old, they should have the option of picking a few dry peas; they should also have an opportunity of getting out to another sty or yard, where they should have a trough with a little milk if possible, or flour and water, and that not too thick. When weaning time comes on they take readily to their food, and do not waste in condition as when they have not had the advantage of feeding
