ELECTRIC TIME SAVING WASHER

Takes the Place of the Washer Woman

Costs less to run than the washer woman eats.

Does your washer woman disappoint you often? Have you trouble getting help to do the washing? Let this Electric Washer be your washer woman. It will always be on hand on wash day, will not get sick or tired, will waste no time in talking, and never complain. It is far easier on the clothes than a washer woman, and does the washing better than she can do it.

The Time Saver Electric Washer does the washing while you are at other work; washes while you prepare breakfast, while you do the up-stair work and get the dinner. It pays for itself in a year in saving of washer woman's wages and laundry bills. Costs less to run than a washer woman eats, for it washes and wrings the clothes on 2c. an hour. It is simple and easy to operate. We have a Time Saver in the store to show you. Let us demonstrate it in your home. Phone or call.

V. A. D'S HONORED DR. CHARLES COPP

Make Presentation in Recognition of Services Rendered Association.

(Toronto Globe, March 31.)
"Casa Loma" is forever opening its hospitable doors for some gathering closely connected with patriotic work, and its walls know the sight of various sorts of uniforms almost better than any building in town except the Armouries. Yesterday it was the sobriety of the St. John Ambulance Nursing Division which thronged its halls and rooms; the Divisions having gathered, by the permission of the chief commissioner of the brigade, Sir Henry Pellatt, to do honor to Dr. Charles J. Copp, who has been for so long the medical officer, and has been the man who opened the gate to let the V. A. D. applicants through either to service overseas or to the work at home. Lady Pellatt received in the great library, where many flowers filled the air with beauty and fragrance, and speeches were made by Sir Henry, Mrs. Henderson, of Montreal, who was one of the chief instigators of the movement to give some token of appreciation to Dr. Copp, and Dr. Carter, of London, Ont. The address of the day was read by Mrs. A. E. Gooderham, district superintendent, uniformed and veiled as were the other officers and members of the brigade, and at its close Dr. Copp was given a very beautiful gold watch, on a platinum chain, very specially wrought, the watch itself carrying the insignia of the Order of St. John and an inscription. At the same time Mrs. Copp was given a sheaf of pink roses by the Divisions and a large bouquet of pink carnations by Lady Pellatt. The tea-table was laid in the dining room, Mrs. Hickey Bond and Mrs. Buckley in charge, their assistants being the Misses Close and Miss Rita Rogers. The Divisions all over Canada were represented either in person or by wire, and those present from town were: Mrs. Hunter Ogilvie, of Kingston, Miss Colley and Miss Smith, of Montreal, Miss Paton of Winnipeg, Miss McKillop, of London, Mrs. Todd, of Ottawa, Mrs. McLaren, of Perth, and there were also a few guests from town, besides the V. A. D.'s—Mrs. H. D. Warren, Miss Fleming, Dr. Norton and Dr. Cameron. The affair made a delightful and unexpected reunion for the V. A. D.'s, many of whom met for the first time since they had said good-bye overseas.
Division No. 31, of this city, contributed its share towards the presentation, and Mrs. John Black, the commandant of the division, sent a telegram of regret at being unable to be present at the presentation and of good wishes for the future welfare of St. John's Ambulance Brigade.

True Knights of Faith

A sharp turning, and then a second one, brought them to the head of a short stair, from which they looked straight down upon the scene of the uproar. A square oak-floored hall lay beneath them, from which opened the doors of the principal guest-chambers. This hall was as light as day, for torches burned in numerous sconces upon the walls, throwing strange shadows from the tusked or antlered heads which ornamented them. At the very foot of the stair, close to the open door of their chamber, lay the senechal and his wife; she with her head shorn from her shoulders, he struck through with a sharpened stake which still protruded from either side of his body. Three servants of the castle lay dead beside them, all torn and dragged, as though a pack of wolves had been upon them. In front of the central guest-chamber stood Du Guesclin and Sir Nigel, half-clad and unarmed, with the mad joy of battle gleaming in their eyes. Their heads were thrown back, their lips compressed, their blood-stained swords poised over their right shoulders, and their left feet thrown out. Three dead men lay huddled together in front of them; while a fourth, with the blood squirting from a severed vessel, lay back with upturned knees, breathing in weary gasps. Further back—all panting together, like the wind in a tree—there stood a group of fierce, wild creatures, breasted and armed with long English arrows, and the rush of the combat. The assailants gave back, the knights rushed forward, and in a very few moments the hall was cleared, and Hordie John had hurled the last of the wild men down the steep steps which led from the end of it.

"Do not follow them," cried Du Guesclin. "We are lost if we scatter. For myself I care not a denier, though it is a poor thing to meet one's end at the hands of such scum; but I have my dear lady here, who must by no means be risked. We have breathing space now, and I would ask you, Sir Nigel, what it is that you would counsel?"
"By St. Paul!" answered Sir Nigel. "I can by no means understand what hath befallen us, save that I have been woken up by your battle-cry, and rushing forth, found myself in the midst of this small bickering. Harrow and alas for the lady and the senechal! What dogs are they who have done this bloody deed?"
"They are the Jacks, the men of the brushwood. They have the castle, though I know not how it hath come to pass. Look from this window into the bailey."
"By heaven!" cried Sir Nigel, "it is as bright as day with the torches. The gates stand open, and there are three thousand of them within the walls. See how they rush and scream and wave! What is it that they thrust out through the postern door? My God! it is a man-at-arms, and they pluck him limb from limb, like hounds on a wolf. Now another, and yet another. They hold the whole castle, for I see their faces at the windows. See, there are some with great bundles on their backs."
"It is dried wood from the forest. They pile them against the walls and set them in a blaze. Who is this who cries to check them? By St. Hves! it is the good priest who spoke for them in the hall. He kneels, he prays, he implores! What! villains, would ye pluck hands against those who have befriended you? Ah, the butcher has struck him! He is down! They stamp him under their feet! They tear off his gown and save it in the air! See now, how the flames lick up the walls! Are there none left to rally round us? With a hundred men we might hold our own."
"Oh, for my Company!" cried Sir Nigel. "But where is Ford, Alenquer?"
"He is foully murdered, my fair lord."
"The saints receive him! May he rest in peace! But here come some. This hall was as light as day, for torches burned in numerous sconces upon the walls, throwing strange shadows from the tusked or antlered heads which ornamented them. At the very foot of the stair, close to the open door of their chamber, lay the senechal and his wife; she with her head shorn from her shoulders, he struck through with a sharpened stake which still protruded from either side of his body. Three servants of the castle lay dead beside them, all torn and dragged, as though a pack of wolves had been upon them. In front of the central guest-chamber stood Du Guesclin and Sir Nigel, half-clad and unarmed, with the mad joy of battle gleaming in their eyes. Their heads were thrown back, their lips compressed, their blood-stained swords poised over their right shoulders, and their left feet thrown out. Further back—all panting together, like the wind in a tree—there stood a group of fierce, wild creatures, breasted and armed with long English arrows, and the rush of the combat. The assailants gave back, the knights rushed forward, and in a very few moments the hall was cleared, and Hordie John had hurled the last of the wild men down the steep steps which led from the end of it."

"What, then, would you counsel?"
"That we make for the keep. It is unused, save in time of war, and the keys hang from my poor lord and master's belt."
"There are two keys there."
"It is the larger. Once there, we might hold the narrow stair; and at long English arrows, and the rush of the squire and the two English archers down the stairs, turned the tide of the combat. The assailants gave back, the knights rushed forward, and in a very few moments the hall was cleared, and Hordie John had hurled the last of the wild men down the steep steps which led from the end of it."
