

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

On the third night after his departure from Vienna a Hungarian... stopped at a quiet inn, situated in the suburbs of a small town.

Having first ascertained that his three horses, he sat down to appear with his host and family. During the meal he was asked what he had done in Vienna.

He told them he had been there to sell some of the best horses that were ever taken to that market.

As the dealer threw off his jacket, and loosened the girdle round his waist, where his money was deposited.

Accordingly he drew out an old leather purse that contained the gold, and then a tattered parchment book that contained the Austrian bank notes.

He had no misgivings as to the character of the people he had fallen amongst to hinder his repose, and the poor dealer was soon enjoying a profound and happy sleep.

It might have been in this state of beatitude an hour or two, when he was disturbed by a noise like that of an opening window, and by a sudden rattle of the night air.

He had scarcely done so, when the hard breathing of a man was heard at the open window, and the next moment a violent fellow dropped into the room, and, staggering across it, propped his way by the wall to the door.

"Fear had almost deprived the horse-dealer of his senses, but yet he perceived that the intruder, whoever he might be, was drunk.

Then, indeed, he would have left his hiding-place and gone to rouse the people in the inn to get another restorative, but he was so much terrified that he could not do so.

"Leave the light where it is," whispered the host, "it may disturb him, and give us trouble."

The first figure that met the eyes of the murderer was that of the innkeeper. The host of the inn, who was sitting at the table, looked at the murderer with a look of surprise.

"What is the matter?" asked the innkeeper. "What is the matter?" asked the innkeeper. "What is the matter?" asked the innkeeper.

"The murderer's head upon roundly to those who were seated at the table. The murderer's head upon roundly to those who were seated at the table.
