"PHANTOM WIRES"

to "The Wire Tappers" The New York Times of April 13

Arthur Stringer's latest novel: PHANTOM WIRES. A novel, by the author of "The Wire Tappers," Loom of Destiny," etc. Illustrated by Arthur William Brown. Pp. 295. Boston:

This new novel by Arthur Stringer is sequel to his "Wire Tappers," which JOS. BROWN, Auctioneer, and dwindling purses they have vainly endeavored to put the past behind and dwindling purses they have vainly them. But the necessities of daily life claim them and draw them back, separately and then together, into the very same bogs out of which they had tried to escape. The novel belongs primarily with the stories of incident and adventure, but it has some admirable qualities in ad-DR. BENTLEY, DENTIST, OVER SOVER dition which these do not usually pos-EIGN Bank, Dundas and Adelaide. Fhons sess. It is one breathless adventure after another, with the suspense constantly sustained. Even an old stager at novel-reading marvels at the fertility and deftness of Mr. Stringer's invention of incident. He manages to bring into almost all the happenings some unexpected factor which surprises the reader and keeps his interest at a high pitch. The tightening coil of circumstances around Jim and Frank Durkin brings them back to New York and into association with the same old gang whose ways they had abjured. Under thin disguises appear such powers of the under-world as Richard Canfield. Al Adams and their lieutenants, and there is a brief scene with a district attorney, whose portrait needs no identification. For a time both husband and wife almost despair, and say to themselves and to each other that it is no use fighting against the tide of circumstances, which seems bound to sweep them back into the old whirlpool of crime. But they make a gallant fight, using the weapons of the criminals in making it, and finally they win-as those must who fight so bravely. But the way lies through such daring deeds and breathless adventures and hairbreadth escapes as convince the reader that the pirate of a commercial age can have just as exciting a life as did his predecessor of the Spanish Main. But in addition to all this it must be counted in the book's favor that it is very deftly and convincingly woven together, that it is excellent and interesting in its presentation of character and motives, and that its exciting narrative is full of intellectual as well as emotional interest. Therein it differs from the usual American novel of adventure, which is prone to be very bald in its telling, like a vine that has grown out of a soil so poor and thin that it can put forth neither foliage nor flowers, and is able to show nothing but stems. The book takes its title from a sort of telepathic power with which husband and wife are invested, so that at times of great crisis they send intuitions of danger to each other. It is a risky theme, but the author handles it skillfully and with
