Harry Heathcote of Gangoll.

BY ANTHONY PHOLLOPE.

'Them rats always does leave a falling house,' said Mrs. Growler.

'At seven o'clock the sun went down, though the gloom of a tropical evening had not yet come. The two ladies went out to the gate, which was but a few yards from the veranda, and there stood listening for the sound of Harry's horse. The low moaning of the wind through the trees could be heard, but it was so gentle, so continuous, and unaltered that it seemed to be no more than a vehicle for other sounds, and was as death-like as silence itself. The gate of the horse paddock through which Heathcote must pass on his way home was nearly a mile distant; but the road there was hard, and they knew that they could hear from there the fall of his horse's feet. There they stood from seven to nearly eight, whispering a word now and then to each other, listening always, but in vain. Looking away to the west every now and then, they fancied that they could see the sky glow with flames, and then they would tell each other that it was fancy. The evening grew darker and still darker, but no sound was heard through the moaning wind. From time to time Mrs. Growler came out to them, declaring her fears in no measured terms. 'Well, marm, I do declare I think we'd better go away out of this.' 'Go away! Mrs. Growler! What nonsense! Where can we go to?' 'The mill would be nearest, m'am, and we would be safe there. I'm sure Mrs. Mediot would take us in.'

'Why should you not be safe here?' said Kate.

'That wretched Chinese hasn't gone and left us for nothing, miss, and what would we three lone women do here if all them Brownies came down upon us? Why don't master come back? He ought to come back, oughtn't he, m'am? He never do think what lone women are.'

Mrs. Heathcote took her husband's part very strongly, and gave Mrs. Growler as hard a scolding as she knew how to pronounce. But her own courage was giving way much as Mrs. Growler's had done. 'We are bound to stay here,' she said; 'and if the worst comes, we must bear it as others have done before us.' Then Mrs. Growler was very sulky, and, retreating to the kitchen, sobbed there in solitude. 'Oh, Kate, I do wish he would come,' said the elder sister. 'Are you afraid?' 'It is so desolate, and he may be so far off, and we couldn't get to him if any thing happened, and we shouldn't know.'

Then they were again silent, and remained without exchanging more than a word or two for nearly half an hour. They took hold of each other, and every now and then went to the kitchen door that the old woman might be comforted by their presence, but they had no consolation to offer each other. The silence of the bush, and the feeling of great distances, and the dread of calamity almost crushed them. At last there was a distant sound of horse's feet. 'I hear him,' said Mrs. Heathcote, rushing forward toward the outer gate of the horse paddock, followed by her sister.

Her ears were true, but she was doomed to disappointment. The horseman was only a messenger from her husband—Mickey O'Dowd, the Irish boundary rider.

He had great tidings to tell, and was so long telling them that they will not attempt to give them in his own words. The purport of his story was as follows: Harry had been to Boonabong House, but had found so one there but the old man. Returning home thence toward his own fence, he had smelted the smoke of fire, and had found within a furlong of his path a long ridge of burning grass. According to Mickey's account, it could not have been lighted above a few minutes before Heathcote's presence was spotted. As it was, it had got on ahead for him. It lit out in a straight line; a few yards it was extinguished, but—so Mickey apprehending the matter—a quarter of a mile or thereabouts it had called his attention, and had at once made himself some two or three hundred yards ahead, making a second fire that lit down that der control.

Before the hinder flames had caught him, Bender and Jacko had been with him, and they had thus managed to consume the fuel, which, had it remained there, would have fed the fire which was too strong to be mastered. By watching the extremities of the line of fire, they overpowered it, and so the damage was for the moment at an end.

The method of dealing with the enemy was so well known in the bush, and had been so often canvassed in the hearing of the two sisters, that it was clearly intelligible to them. The evil had been met in the proper way, and the remedy had been effective. But why did not Harry come home?

Mickey O'Dowd, after his fashion, explained that too. The ladies were not to wait dinner. The master felt himself obliged to remain out at night, and had gotten food at the German's hut. He, Mickey, was commissioned to return with a flask full of brandy, as it would be necessary that Harry, with all the men whom he could trust, should be on the rampage, all night.

This small body was to consist of Harry himself, of the German, of Jacko, and, according to the story as at present told, especially of Mickey O'Dowd. Much as she would have wished to have kept the man at the station for protection, she did not think of disobeying her husband's orders. So Mickey was fed, and then sent back with the flask—with tidings also as to the desertion of that wretched cook, Sing Sing.

'I shall sit here all night,' said Mrs. Heathcote to her sister. 'Things are, I shall not think of going to bed.'

Kate declared that she would also sit in the veranda all night; and, as a matter of course, they were joined by Mrs. Growler. They had been so seated about an hour when Kate Daly declared that the heavens were on fire. The two young women jumped up, flew to the gate, and found that the whole western horizon was lurid with a dark red light.

CHAPTER IX.

Harry Heathcote had on this occasion entertained no doubt whatever that the fire had been intentional and premeditated. A lighted torch must have been dragged along the grass, so as to ignite a line many yards long all at the same time. He had been luckily near enough to the spot to almost see the commencement of the burning, and was therefore aware of its form and circumstances. He almost wondered that he had not seen the figure of the man who had drawn the torch, or at any rate heard his steps. Pursuit would have been out of the question, as his work was wanted at that moment to extinguish the flames. The miscreant probably had remembered this, and had known that he might escape stealthily without the noise of a rapid retreat.

When the work was over, when he had put out the fire he had himself lighted, and had exterminated the lingering remnants of that which had been intended to destroy him, he stood still a while almost in despair. His condition seemed to be hopeless. What could he do against such a band of enemies, knowing as he did that had he been backed even by a score of trusty fellows, one foe might still suffice to ruin him? At the present moment he was very hot with the work he had done, as were also Jacko and the German. O'Dowd had also come up as they were completing their work. Their mode of extinguishing the flames had been to beat them down with branches of gum-tree loaded with leaves. By sweeping these about the burning ground the low flames were scattered and expelled. The work was very hard, and the men were very hot, and the air around them was full of smoke. Most of the men were very much fatigued, and were sitting on the ground, some of them with their heads on the ground, and some with their hands on their faces, and some with their hands on their heads, and some with their hands on their chests, and some with their hands on their stomachs, and some with their hands on their backs, and some with their hands on their legs, and some with their
