

HOME.
What constitutes a home?
Not high-walled walls, nor gilded doors, nor gilded panels, white-washed on costly walls;
Not parlor richly dressed,
With curtains light, streaming through
The open windows,
Nor floors from the richest wood;
On polished wax, gilt walls and pictures;
Not turned walks or lawns,
Where children's shadows mark the lingering hours;
Not through the night, hill down,
Moon-lighted fountains fall in silver showers;
Not that nestles in a gloomy wood,
But love that nestles in a gleaming wood,
Not when the sun is shining,
But when the sun is shining,
Not when the sun is shining,
But when the sun is shining.

LADY KILDARE;
OR,
THE RIVAL CLAIMANTS.
CHAPTER IV.—(CONTINUED)
"Read the letter for yourself, Lady Nora," suggested Lord Redmond, "I will tell you more than I can do."
He took the letter out of the packet and placed it in her hands. It was incased in a long envelope and heavily sealed with red wax. It was addressed to the Lady Nora Kildare, and had a very laconic appearance.

"Do not feel able to discuss the matter to-night," said the Lady Nora.
"Let us defer this discussion until my guardians come. You will remain at the castle until then, will you not?"
Lord Redmond accepted the invitation without hesitation. He had evidently expected to be asked to remain.
"Your luggage is over at Glanara," he said.

"I shall be sent for in the morning, Mr. Kildare informs me that he will be here in a day or two with Sir Russell. I should like you to remain to meet the gentlemen until then, will you not?"
Lord Redmond expressed his thanks warmly and declared his willingness to stay.
The Lady Nora arose and touched the silver bell pull, and then returned her seat.

The Lady Nora arose and touched the silver bell pull, and then returned her seat.

then Lord Redmond, professing to be tired, was chosen to his room.
Left to himself, he thought of the letter he had just received, and the excitement going on in the shaded room, which he had just left.
And here he sat down in the shadow of a great tree, and made a book of one end of the balcony, and the tearful look of his lovely wife, and a great despair convulsed her face.

"It is well to be cautious," he said.
"Out does not relinquish a stony home like Point Kildare until convinced that assistance is useless here is the certificate of my birth."
The Lady Nora looked at that also.

"And here," continued Lord Redmond, "are certificates from the people whom you represent your guardian. There are other less important papers for the eyes I shall depend upon living witnesses. The clergyman and both the witnesses of Lord Redmond Kildare's marriage to Madeline Bannan are still living. The doctor who presided at my birth also lives. And, at least, as the phrase goes, Madeline Kildare also lives, and is in her right mind. Does not the case look plain?"

"I do not say that," replied Lady Nora half angrily. "When I am in all this difficulty, all that remains to me is to leave the castle, resigning everything to you. Either you or I are owner here. You have made out a strong case, which I must have to consider."

"Let me hope that my entrance into the castle as master will not be the signal for your leaving as mistress," said Lord Redmond gravely. "I am not to say to you—much to explain. I must see you alone for a few minutes."

"Not to-night," she said. "The hour is late. I do not care for your explanations. It is enough for me to know that you are still living. Had I known that, I should not have had much to do with you."

"I should have thought you had had enough of private marriage," answered Bannan, as her ladyship's moved on toward the castle.
The Lady Kildare started as if she had been struck by a bolt of lightning, and she turned back toward the castle.

CHAPTER V.
SHARING CONFIDENCE.
The mail bag to Point Kildare was made in a perfect silence on the part of the Lady Kildare. Bannan's address, her consent, but she crumpled in the stern of the boat, paying no heed to his words, and not once turning her head, despairing eyes upon him. The presence of Mary, the Lady Kildare's maid, prevented any allusion to the great secret existing between the strangely, fruitlessly looked pair; and Bannan's eyes were cast on the shore of Point Kildare.

"The Lady Kildare passed a moment in the sunlight, on the rocks, turning her white face toward her lover. She waved her hand to him, and moved slowly away toward the castle, followed by her maid.
"One word, Kathleen," cried Bannan, following her. "I have much to say to you—much to explain. I must see you alone for a few minutes."

"Not to-night," she said. "The hour is late. I do not care for your explanations. It is enough for me to know that you are still living. Had I known that, I should not have had much to do with you."

"I should have thought you had had enough of private marriage," answered Bannan, as her ladyship's moved on toward the castle.
