Divers' Dangers.

There is, at any rate, one post-war activity in which Britons have to take a back seat.

That is as deep-sea divers in the work of salvaging vessels which have been sunk by mine or torpedo.

It is here that the Jap shows his superiority. The Japanese diver can descend to a greater depth than the British diver, and, what is more, he will remain longer under the water without apparent injury to health.

This is no mere boasting claim by the Japanese themselves; it is the expert but truthful admission of an expert with a long association with marine salvage work. Few Japanese divers are engaged at work round the coasts of Britain, their activities in this direction being mostly confined to the Mediterranean.

The greatest depth at which a British diver can work under water without doing himself a serious injury is from twenty to twenty-two fathoms; that is, at the most, 130 feet below the surface. Even then our divers can remain only a comparatively short time at that depth, and they are obliged to descend and ascend very slowly to prevent the blood from gushing from their bodies.

In some of the Government salvage ships what is known as a decompressing chamber is now provided, which the diver on ascending can enter and gradually become acclimatized to the natural atmosphere on the surface. A Japanese diver can work with comparative comfort at a depth of twenty-seven or twenty-eight fathoms, or nearly 170 feet below the point where the salvage ship is moored, and as a rule he is not in such haste to give the signal to be hoisted up as his British colleague.

Eastern fatalism enters largely into the composition of these Japanese divers, and on this account the yellow men are inclined to take risks far below the surface, which British divers, no less intrepid, would hesitate to take.

Unexpected danger often confronts the deep-sea diver who has located a wreck which has been sent to the bottom by torpedo.

The pressure of the water frequently has the effect of crumpling up parts of the vessel near the spot where the torpedo has shattered the sides, and sometimes even an ordinary touch will cause part of the splintered hull to collapse. The danger in such circumstances of being enveloped by a mass of wreckage is ever present.

Genius and Old Age.

It is generally accepted that great development of the powers of the brain is usually accompanied by only moderate animal or physical life.

In those cases where high development of both is found, it is emphatically marked by shortness of existence or defective vitality in the structures of organic life and low organization.

Mental celebrities of large stature have been in a noticeable minority, and the standard of health very low; in fact, according to John O'London's Weekly, from Alfred the Great to Schiller the physical defects have been painfully apparent, and the roll of countless names seems to be the list of a gathering of invalids and cripples.

I copied that passage out of an article on psychology, not because what it intentionally says about psychology is interesting (though I think it is) but because what it intentionally says about psychology is more interesting.

A Comment On This Eternal Hope

Observe these two sentences,— they not a comment on the psychology of eternal hope?

"Until recently all the ideas we had about them (the emotions) were wrong."

"Now we know."

How naive that is, and how natural!

As Stevenson puts it:

"Undying hope is co-ruler of the human bosom with infallible credibility. A man finds he has been wrong at every preceding stage of his career only to deduce the astonishing conclusion that he is at last entirely right."

We Felt Sure This Was Final.

Do you remember, when you were to school, how you were told about the strange and mistaken ideas of physics and chemistry men used to hold, and then were informed that at last we had arrived at the truth about the universe in the formulation of the atomic theory?
