WENTWORTH.

In spite of being uncomfortable and aware that she was not regarded with favor by her employers she was not unhappy. She was eager and speculative by nature, and the difference in family life, with the relics of manners and customs which came under her notice, interested her; and she was too indifferent to the people among whom for the present her lot was cast to be disturbed by their want of affection for herself. She lived curiously apart from them, and was affected merely objectively by what she saw. She felt no disgust or concern of any kind when she saw Herr Nowakowsky, saved opposite her, take a boiled egg from its cup, divide it lengthwise by a cunning troke of his broad-bladed table, knife, scoop but half the egg, and tip it down his throat from the end of that same knife. She only looked at him with ouriosity and interest, and wondered how he did it; whether he had to practice very long before he succeeded in accomplishing the feat without any personal risk. She did not lose her self-control or equanimity when she saw Frau Camphausen kick her eldest son, a lad of 13, in a rage, or thump her eldest daughter's shoulders with her fist, when in the same frame of mind. She only raised her eyebrows, lifted her lip in a half-smile, and generally left the'room with her head a little higher than usual. She listened with absorbed interest when she heard the youngest boy (a boy of 8, and the most in vecterate little liar that ever breathed) invent a long and complicated string of falsehoods in answering his mother's questions as to why he had been late coming home from school. She never complained of the children to their manners and customs; but her face was very expressive, and take wit all in all she was amply revenged for Frau Camphausen's often studied rudeness and neglect, by the embarrassment which appeared in that portly lady's face when, fin the midst of some lecture, chastisement or catechism, she encountered Miss Wentworth's calmly critical eyes and composed countenance, with its half-amused, half-cyni elined to interfere in any other department.

Her compatroit she had not seen again, but she had heard of him from time to time, and the information she got may be condensed into the following:

He was an engineer employed by the German Government to construct a new line of railway between Jacewo and Berg, a town on the Russian frontier. His name was John Garthwaite, and he came from England, but from which part of England no one seemed to know. He divided his time between Jacewo and Berg, and when at Jacewo lived at the Alder, the principal hotel in the place. He could visit at any of the houses in the town; but availed himself of his privileges to only a very limited extent, being by nature, (so Diana was told) to a degree up. tent, being by nature, (so Diana was told) reserved and self-contained, to a degree unsual even among Englishmen. He was shut out from a good deal of social pleasure because he did not play cards, and cards were the chief amusement of the people of Jaccwo. Women played as vigorously as men, and Frau Camphausen's bosom friend, Frau Olawska, would sit down to the whist-table in the evening and remain there

CHAPTER VII.

THE CURTAIN RISES.

It had been with great unwillingness that John Garthwaite had gone to Berg the morning after his meeting with Diana, He wery much disliked the whole Camphausen family. He had heard all about their project of having an English governess; they had taken him into their confidence, and had discussed the subject in his presence frequently, with constant appeals he his judgement and opinion. In the midst of it he had gone to Berg for some some specially subject.

The Curtain Rises.

Among the pains and aches cured with marvelous rapidity with Dr. Thomas Eclectric Oil, is car-ache. The young are specially subject to it, and the desirability of this Oil as a family remained by the fact that it is admirably adapted not only to the above aliment, but also to the hurts, disorders of the bowels, and affections of the throat, to which the midst of it he had gone to Berg for some time, and when he came back the matter had been settled, and he heard with complete indifference that a suitable Singlish lady had been met with and engaged. Later, he was told with some excitement that she was to arrive on New Year's Every but he had straightway forgotten all about it. As far as "Miss Ventvert" occupied his mind at all, she figured as a middle laged woman, worn with toll and hardened by a long struggle to keep her place in the world; with few ideas, and those narrowed by limited experience and monotony of entering the cristed years ago. The governess and one of the stringly. He had seen her and talked to her, and he would never forsether; he felt that at once. After leaving the Camphansens' house, he had gone to his hotel, and ast for hours smoking and lost in thought. He wondered how Diana would find herself in the new life and surroundings. He had no experience of governesses; and, while admitting his ignorance, he could not pursuade himself that the young lady whose acquaintance he had just was a fair representative of her class.

Writing Advertisements.

"Do it well or not at all," is the motto of one of America's greatest publishers. It is a good motto to apply to advertising. Not every successful business man can write a good advertisement, but there is scarcely any part of business that is more important. The following suggestions on this subject are from the pen of Allston C. Ladd: "Write your advertisement without any thought of saving words—just as you would write a letter. Then go over it and mark out superfluous words and cut out statements which you then see will not interest the reader. Then mentally place yourself in the position of a customer, as though your interests were outside of the counter rather than behind it, and consider how the advertisement would appear to you. Look carefully to see whether you have not written in too technical a vein, as a result of knowing all about goods of which your customer has but a superficial knowledge. Analyze the matter thoroughly and see if you have really written for the reader anything more than that you deal in shoes. Have you offered him an attraction in price or novelty? If you have not, you had better try again; you have simply copied your competitor. If the advertisement seems satisfactory, it is a good plan to lay it aside for a day or two, for when you again take it up the wording may not seem so attractive. For you must not overlook the fact that you are to pay good money for that advertising, and that the expenditure of that money is entitled to [as careful (consideration as is the matter of elerk hire, rent, the accuracy of your freight bill, or any other detail of your business. The difference between efficient advertising and that which is not is the difference between giving money away and making a profit (on the amount spent for the advertisement) which even the pawn-broker does not get. Careless advertising is costly at any price."
