AN AGE OF ASSOCIATIONS. In his address as president, delivered at the general meeting of the Medical Association, last evening, Dr. Moorhouse extended a welcome to the members. He spoke of the age as one of associations, every calling having its organization, with the result that the status of society at large was raised. Referring to the medical association, he said it gave each member of the profession an opportunity of meeting his fellow-practitioners from throughout the length and breadth of the land. They heard papers and debates on the various subjects of interest, medical or surgical, in which are detailed the failures and triumphs over disease. It also gave him renewed and increased enthusiasm, without which the medical man was unable to work successfully or comfortably. Failures as well as successes were recorded and discussed.
