the tariff. He advised the government to go slowly in reducing the duty on agricultural implements. The protection was already small; no great good could come of a change, but an industry might be annihilated. He urged more protection against British boots and shoes by means of a valuation to offset the depreciation in sterling exchange. As to the increased American tariff on Canadian wheat, Mr. Euler observed that he sometimes thought retaliation in the transaction of its business.

He thought the extra money collected in sales tax on automobiles and the transaction of its business.

He thought the extra money collished should be returned to the dealers. It did not belong to the public treasury and there was much justified complaint about it. He favored the formation of a parliation in mentary committee to investigate the

He was in accord with much contained in the speech from the throne, especially in the promise of the reduction in expenditure and taxation. Heavy taxation, he went on, was not chargeable to this or any other government. He believed in customs duties as a form of tax. He believed in the income tax, but the means of collection should be simplified. He thought no tax should be imposed on the profits of a business, but on the laddress was that there were tariff walls all around. The United States had established a high tariff. The acting prime minister had stated that he did not like the word "retallation" as applied to the tariff. "It sometimes seems to me, however, that retaliation in matters of trade is the only word that our American friends understand and appreciate," Mr. Euler said.
