It has faith in the energy and thrift of our own people, and in the vast capabilities of our own country. The World believes in Canada making a prestige for herself, and building up a greater Britain. This, too, is sentiment; but it is Canadian, not Imperial, and it is attainable. Does the Whig or the News doubt it? Whig or the News doubt it?

The British yoke is mild, we are told. But why should four and a half millions of Canadians wear a yoke, be it harsh or mild? They are just as intelligent as Englishmen, and they have a more perfect system of government. Why should a government four thousand miles away possess authority to revise their laws, to regulate of complaining sorely of the miserable kind of court-house in which he has to administrate away to say upon what their merchant marine, or to say upon what terms they shall trade with foreign states?
