

to make the word pictures so vivid as to kindle the imagination of the pupil, and thus to put him into sympathy with the people of whom he reads. The book deals with live men more than with the dead earth.

Teachers and parents are advised to insist upon having the children read with a large wall map or an atlas constantly before them. The pictures of life and places, which are formed, will then be connected with the countries where the life really exists. By this means a beginning will be made in forming a conception of the world as it is.

LARKIN DUNTON.

Boston, June 30, 1891.