The portion of the exhibition devoted to the French and British navies is one of the most interesting which are shown. The French and British sail-ors are depicted enjoying an on-shore "entente," in which the cordial feeling of brothers in arms is decidedly apparent. A splendid series of British battleship pictures follows, in which two notable vessels are H.M.S. New Zealand, the contribution of a British colony to the empire's defence, and H.M.S. Carnarvon, which figured in the sinking of five of the German ships off the Falkland Islands. The French fleet likewise passed in active service review, and was followed by President Poincare and his staff, for whom the band played "Le Marseillaise." The French army furnishes some of the clearest pictures in the whole exhibition, and is seen in extended order, pre-
