Solicitor-General's Duties. On an item of $10,000 for expenses i connection with cases before the railway board, Mr. Borden expressed the opinion that the Solicitor-General should represent the country in a num ber of cases coming before the body mentioned. The Minister of Justice and his deputy had all the work they could do, but, though he had been trying for four or five years, Mr. Bor den had failed to find out what the duties of the Solicitor-General were

Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that th office of solicitor-general had existed for at least twenty years and had been filled by men of eminence. The solici tor-general had lots of work in con nection with the department of jus tice, part of it including preliminary investigation into applications for pardons, etc. Proceeding, he said that in these days legal work was very much specialized, and in regard to the cases before the board it had been found advisable on that account to at times engage a specialist. He did not know that the Solicitor-General had given attention to the class of work coming before the board. Mr. Monle who thought under existing conditions the proposition to abolish the office of solicitor-general might be regarded as reasonable urged that the board should have joint secretary thoroughly conversant with the French language. The secretary of the board was very able and capable, but did not understand the French language very well. Sir Wilfrid Laurier understood that there was already an official of the board thoroughly conversant with the language, who dealt with the French correspondence. If his other duties interfered with this an arrangement should be made to obviate it. Dr. Sproule said he had discovered that the Solicitor-General was doing an important work, namely, franking political literature, some of which the doctor had collected in British Colum-

Hon, G. P. Graham, answering Mr. Monk, said his view was that correspondence received in French should be answered in that language expeditiously. He was not prepared to say what state of affairs might result with the appointment of two secretaries. The minister added that he would bring the matter before the new chairman of the board and be governed by him. Hon. Mr. Lemieux believed that there would be no grievance as regards the hearing of French cases before the railway board in future.
