A COMPARISON

Writer Says American Conscience Has Deteriorated

NATION BOLDER WHEN WEAK

Deals With Duty of United States Toward Belgium in the Present Crisis—Contrast With Action of Years Ago

A very interesting contrast is drawn between the American government of 1915 and the American government of 1918 by Dr. Morton Prince, one of the most famous of American psychologists. Dr. Prince is one of those who believe that the duty of the United States was to protest when Germany invaded Belgium. He does not say whether the American Republic should have taken arms against Germany, as Col. Roosevelt and other American public men have declared, but that it was the plain duty of the United States to act toward Belgium as she acted nearly one hundred years ago toward Greece, then engaged in a struggle with Turkey, is his conviction. He believes that the American conscience has deteriorated since the days of Monroe, and that while Americans today read with pride of the boldness of their country when it was small and weak, the Americans of another generation will read with shame its action in 1914, when it was rich and powerful, and when its mere protest might have changed the whole course of the most dreadful war in all history.

Monroe No Neutral.

In 1821 the Grecian "Senate" sent a formal appeal to the people of the United States for sympathetic support in the rebellion of Greece against Turkish oppression, and when congress next assembled President Monroe in his presidential message referred to the struggle in these words:

"A strong hope has been long entertained, founded on the heroic struggle of the Greeks, that they would succeed in their contest and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth. From the facts which have come to our knowledge, there is good cause to believe that their enemy has lost forever all dominion over them; that Greece will become again an independent nation. That she may obtain that rank is the object of our most ardent wishes."

Daniel Webster introduced a motion appropriating funds to equip a commission which should visit Greece and obtain first-hand information, his idea being not so much to do anything effective, or to obtain proof of statements that were doubted, but to bring the matter before the house for consideration and discussion, the president's reference to Greece not requiring any action of expression of opinion by congress.

Webster's Sympathy

In his speech on this motion Webster said: "I close, then, Sir, with repeating that the object of this resolution is to avail ourselves of the interesting occasion of the Greek revolution to make our protest against the doctrines of the allied powers, both as they are laid down in principle and as they are applied in practice. I think it right, too, Sir, not to be unseasonable in the expression of our regard, and as far as that goes, in a manifestation of our sympathy with a long oppressed and now struggling people."

"A strong hope has been long entertained, founded on the heroic struggle of the Greeks, that they would succeed in their contest and resume their equal station among the nations of the earth. From the facts which have come to our knowledge, there is good cause to believe that their enemy has lost forever all dominion over them; that Greece will become again an independent nation. That she may obtain that rank is the object of our most ardent wishes."

The Greeks address the allied world with a pathos not easy to be resisted. They invoke our favor by more moving considerations than can well belong to the condition of any other people. They stretch out their arms to the Christian communities of the earth, beseeching them, by a generous recollection of their ancestors, by the consideration of their ruined cities and villages, by their wives and children sold into an scourged slavery, by their blood, which they seem willing to pour out like water, by the common faith and in the name which unites all Christians, that they would extend to them at least some token of compassionate regard."

A Moral Support.

One might substitute "Belgium" for "Greece" in the speeches delivered in congress in the course of this debate, and the words would be applicable to the present situation. Webster answered in advance those who might ask if it were the purpose of the United States to go to war with Turkey for the sake of Greece, and to defy Prussia, Russia, and Austria, which were supporting Turkey in her course. There was no intention of the United States getting into the war, but he believed that a formal protest was due to the character of the American Republic. The protest might well give the Greeks courage and spirit, and "inspire them with constancy in the pursuit of their great end."

No American Consensus.

Dr. Prince believes that the change in policy of the American government in the past century is due to the fact that then the Americans were a homogeneous nation. Practically every citizen was of British stock, with common ideals and political beliefs, and with a uniform sentiment of American nationality. "Today," he says, "we are a polyglot nation, speaking many tongues. We have lost the homogeneity of single race. The people of many nations, each with different political traditions, affiliations and sentiments have been cut into the melting pot, and as yet a single national conscience has not been evolved." It may take another fifty or even a hundred years for the American nation to reach the heights of dignity and courage where its founders dwelt a century ago.

Despises Hypocrites.

Wilson—"I despise a hypocrite."
 Thomson—"So do I."
 Wilson—"Now, take Jackson for example, he's the biggest hypocrite on earth. I despise that man."
 Thomson—"But you seem to be his best friend."
 Wilson—"Oh, yes, I try to appear friendly towards him. It pays better in the end, you know."

Clever Feat.

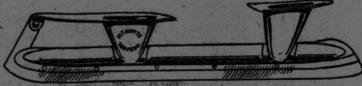

"Father," said a small boy, "what is a demagog?"
 "A demagog, my son, is a man who can rock the boat himself and persuade everybody that there's a terrible storm at hand."
