RALPH WALDO EMERSON By Edward Everett Hale

From an address at the Boston Twentieth Century club, 1898 E WAS my friend for many years, visited repeatedly at my ho talked familiarly as one does with a friend. The thing I want to e phasize is the deep and tender sympathy with all men, and his way applying all his ideals to his everyday life. He hoed his own corn on his Con farm, lived most of his life in comparative poverty, went to the post-office early order to have a chance to talk with the men about the door, and bought cheap me ton bones to keep down expenses. Here is where the difference appears betwee the great idealist and the chipped-off reformers who disgrace the name. So u worldly was he, so completely devoted to his mission of preaching the greatness truth and right, that at the age of forty-six he received his first check from a pull lisher, and did not know how to cash it. His books had then been before the publ for sixteen years.
