GERMAN CAPTIVES SAY BRUSILOFF IS

HECTOR M'DONALD

Russ Leader, Noted For Strategy, and Daring, is Said to be Scottish General

OLD STORY REVIVED

Whispered That McDonald Did Not Die by His Own Hand

HISTORIC EXAMPLES

Other Parallel Cases of Disappearances of Noted Characters

From the New York Sun: There is one Russian officer the Germans had and hate more than any other, it is said, and he is General Alexis A. Brusiloff, quite as well known as the Grand Duke Nicholas as a strategist and fighter. And why is he hated?

Because German officers and soldiers believe he is a Scotchman, formerly a well-known officer in the British army, and that Brusiloff is not his name.

In April a speech of his was reported from a banquet given to three deputies of the duma who were visiting his army. In this he said: "We of the active army are devoted wholeheartedly to Russia and the new government and are all equally prepared to lay down our lives to save Russia and make her happy."

"Until we defeat the enemy and destroy German imperialism and militarism there can be no glorious and powerful Russia. Those who think that the war can now be ended or that the country can be saved without going ahead are mistaken."

"To beat the enemy we must go ahead, for he who advances wins. More the Germans occupy a large area of our country and all this must be won back."

These laudable sentiments alone will not explain why the German fear and hate of Brusiloff persist even in prison camps in France and with fresh batches of prisoners among them who are brought from the eastern front.

"We know who Gen. Brusiloff is," say German prisoners. "He is Hector Macdonald."

Certainly, Brusiloff is intensely anti-German, and intensely democratic; he is an English type, and might not pass for a Russian unless he were labelled. It is said he speaks several languages, chief among them English, with perfection and fluency. During his victories in Galicia in 1914 and in the siberian front in 1915 he persisted with the German forces opposed to him, and was brought back as gossip, to allied battlefields. The myth may be founded on no other solid evidence than his character and appearance, but it is said to be given credence in Berlin and to be discussed as a possibility in London.

Sir Hector Macdonald was an officer of the late '90s who rose through the non-commissioned ranks by sheer force of merit and was granted a title by King Edward VII. His military career had been a long and splendidly brave one. He fought with Kitchener in the Sudan campaign; in the Boer war he commanded a Division under Roberts; subsequently, he was sent to Ceylon as commander-in-chief, and there rose to the pinnacle of his ability and power.

But his success was beclouded when, in 1903, he was recalled to Europe to face a court-martial on a charge of desertion. The circumstances were treated with that silence and secrecy peculiar to the British public in cases of immorality. Macdonald, it was whispered later in London, had been in the company of a club and smoking rooms, had committed suicide in an obscure hotel in Paris rather than bear the disgrace of trial and certain punishment. His death was passed over with scarcely a line, and nothing further was ever written of that or of the charge against him; his former friends disclaimed any knowledge of where he died or where he was buried.

His name has come down to us as that of a man who, like Oscar Wilde and others, wished to have the world think him dead that he might drop completely out of sight and rise again among a people who knew nothing of his existence. Perkin Warbeck, who was proclaimed king of England in 1491, was a man of this type. He was a scoundrel, but he was a scoundrel who was proclaimed king of England in 1491, was a man of this type. He was a scoundrel, but he was a scoundrel who was proclaimed king of England in 1491, was a man of this type.

I am told that Gen. Brusiloff is a man of the people, and was practically unknown and unheard of before his successes in the present war. He was a veteran of the Russo-Japanese and Russo-German wars. I have read, but accounts failed to record on which side he fought or to indicate that he achieved any Russian notice during those campaigns. It would be quite possible in a country so simple and trusting, for a Hector Macdonald to appear among its rural population, take root and grow there, draw him into the open and established him in his proper place with the military forces. The German American citizen and strongly pro- ally into the bargain.

John Nepomuk Salvator, an Austrian grand duke, who endeavored to disappear forever from a world whose court intrigues harassed him, set out as sailing master of a vessel and called himself plain John Orth. Reports that the vessel was never heard of again have come down to us through the years. But lately John Orth is said to be living still as a plain Kansas farmer, by name John Horton, naturalized American citizen and strongly pro- ally into the bargain.

The list might be made a long one and some of the tales might seem well nigh impossible either to prove or disprove, are as credible as that about Gen. A. Brusiloff.

When the Japanese took Port Arthur in the Russo-Japanese war, there was an English officer masquerading as a Jap with the victorious mikado's forces and that he was called Nogi. Later, when Gen. Perkin Warbeck arose, he committed hara-kiri. It was said his mission was done and that he had to disappear in order that Macdonald might rise again, later his own name as rumor or claimed. The minutes of the last meeting were read by the secretary Miss Gladys Smith. A very profitable time was spent by Mr. and Mrs. Aca Wheeler and Mrs. James Minshall on Sunday.

London, May 30.—Describing recent fighting, the Times correspondent at Italian headquarters writes: "The Carso is different from all other battlefields.
