Statistics Canada will study student aid

OTTAWA - Student aid is the subject of a Statistics Canada mail in questionnaire presently being sent out to 7,000 university and community college students across the country. This survey represents 10 per cent of the post-secondary student population. This information will enable legislators and educational authorities to gauge students' needs for funds and their desires regarding various courses of study, the report goes on. It also covers part-time students who are increasing in numbers. Only full-time students are at present eligible for loans under the Canada Student Loan Plan.

Other questions for which the survey seeks answers are such ones as "why do students attend a particular type of post-secondary institution?" and "why are certain types of programs selected as opposed to others?" Still other questions seek to establish the reasons why students move from their home province to another in order to pursue their post-secondary education. Statistics Canada expects to be able to publish the results, available to all, in the fall in order to make them useful to students, university administrators and provincial governments.
