particulars by reason of disposition makes har from whom informatio perhaps remove their sary details. So when Office, in case of which refuge is taken in the st sensitive man, who can other branches.

s timidit. This peculiarity rmally t ful that the parties desired we take offence, and ts i pre d for the neces-*itio * are !bmitted to Head ntial information is lacking, that Mr. So-and-So is a very b asker for information without risking the loss of his beness. Repeated to arse to this excuse naturally causes d Of the think that the manager may be afflicted with a exce the lit. It happens that certain branch manng rs alwa - ave a considerable number of these very sensitive astoner in their books, and, of course, it is a natural thought and a different manager were in charge of one of these bra found to be no mor ensit at than the customers at

At the branches great dan minter at may be experienced on occasions wherein Head and attention attention and attention and attention and attention and attention and attention attention and attention and attention and attention attention and attention attention and attention and attention attention attention attention attention attention and attention attention attention attention attention attention and attention atte see their way to acting upon a ng recommendations sent down by the managers. Perha u a case of this kind the manager may have worked land for months in order to prepare the way for taking up an count regarded by himself as positively safe and highly desirable. Some natures grow rebellious, and a manager may even go so far as to criticize Head Office to the other members of the staff, or to the customers. That, however, is not wise policy. The proper course is first to re-examine the presentation of the proposal, with the object of discovering whether the case admits of being strengthened. If there are additional facts or arguments which can be put forward, calculated to cause the experts in the executive office to reconsider the matter, they should be submitted; but, if after facts and arguments have been exhausted, Head Office has not been convinced, it is best to take the denouement philosophically, and accept the opinion of Head Office with a good grace, as embodying a very wide experience.

Sometimes a manager who has been stationed a considerable time in a locality with which he has become thoroughly familiar gradually builds up a business that requires his own personal attention. That is to say, this manager, with his peculiar knowledge and characteristics, is, or may be, able to handle the affairs of the branch without experiencing losses, but the situation may be such as to make it extremely probable that with a new man in charge difficulty and trouble would develop. Obviously Head Office may be reluctant to promote a