TO THE ADVERTISER:

I see in the issue of the Orchardist of Aug. 7th, A.D. 1894, a notice of what is called "myriads of lice," as attacking the crops in Prince Edward Island. Have they not got the famous crumb bag of the North West? I saw it there in 1882 and will describe it. It resembles a small animal, and there will often be thousands of them around the produce of a single kernel of wheat. It afterwards turns into a small black fly. I think we have here about thirty-three years ago.

This was the pest that destroyed the wheat in so many of the western states, and when I was there, it was steadily moving to the northward. I will probably write the change it made in the agriculture of those countries sometime.
