□ □HO -Doctor Thorn?' asked Leola, smiling. 'No, no, my dear-Philip

'Oh,' said Leola; and refusing Mrs Wetherell's arm with a light laugh, went down-stairs.

Doctor Thorn, the principal dcoto of the county, a white haired old autocrat, who knew all the physical-and nearly all the mental-secrets of al the families in Wealdshire, looked up surprised at the appearance of his young patient, her face beautifully flushed, and her eyes bright and spark-

'I am quite ashamed to have sent for you, Doctor Thorn,' said Leola, with a smile, 'You' see I am quite

'I see nothing of the kind,' interrupted the old man, with a grunt. 'Oh, but indeed -' said Leola, aughing softly, her colour, however, fluctuating strangely beneath the old man's keen eyes.

'Oh, but indeed,' he said, with a shrewd smile, 'I have not lived all my medical life with my head under a bushel, young lady, and you can't deceive me, although you are as clever as you are beautiftl-which I can scarcely believe,' and he gave her a little jerky nod of the head, which he meant for a bow.

'Then shall I tell you a story and nd say I am very ill?' she said, with smile, half defiant, half pleading. her head over Mrs. Wetherell's 'Say that you may be if you don' ake care, and you'll tell the truth, Then he turned to Mrs. Wetherell

'She is feverish,' he said, with a snap of his gold glasses. 'Where has she been? What has she been doing? Caught cold for one thing, been suf fering from suppressed mental excitement. You young ladies of the present day,' and he turned to Leola with a stern nod, 'overtax your strength. You work harder than your Mount Scio | field-labourers, and without the physique and training. Don't go to a ball or a dinner-party, or give one for a week. Then,' and he smiled and nodded, 'you can tell me you are quite well, and I sha'n t, maybe, contradict you. Meanwhile, drink some Madeira-I know you've got some in the cellar."

Then he crossed over to the window to admire the view, and presentwhen quite near Mrs. Wetherell,

'If you will remain and rest, I myself will ride over and explain,' he said, softly.

'Thank you; I am quite resolved o go,' said Leola.

'Then,' he said, and his voice dropped into its most musical key, may I plead for the first waltz?' Leola nodded an assent, and, too wise to strain an advantage, he bowed over her hand and departed. He had just cause to smile with self-gratulation as he strode across the park-all was going well, even

Mary, patient but excited, stood in the midst of this chaotic mass, pleading the cause now of this and now of the other costume. She was quite as their trade cards for £1, or large advertisements from £3. Mary, patient but excited, stood in undecided as her mistress. 'It don't matter what you wear,

There was one dress, a magnificent confection-I think that is what Monsieur Worth calls his greatest producion-it was a dark, rich, crimson satin, almost black in its depth of color; it was plentifully trimmed with a priceless cream-coloured old lace.

It was the most staring combination that well could be conceived. On a plain or short or dumpy woman, it would have been simply unendurable. Leola had never worn it, being repelled by its magnificance, but to-night she pointed to it, and with sudden

'I will wear that.'

Daring was too mild a word for it, and yet when Mary had dressed her in it, and she stood before the cheval utterly free from vanity as she was, that it was a success.

'Oh, miss!' exclaimed Mary, as she arranged the diamond band and pendant, and Leola rapidly slipped on the bracelet, 'You look-I can't tell what you look like!' exclaimed the enthusiastic girl, in despair, 'And the dress, miss! I never never thought it would have looked so beautiful!
