The Maiden's Choice

OR THE LAIRD OF BIRKENLEUCH
A Tale of the Covenanters.

Richard rushed to the door and tried to open it, but could not, for some of the heavy stones of the front wall were bulged in, and lay against it. In desperation he put forth his utmost strength, when the wall suddenly fell inward with a crash, and a mass of snow and stones rolled in upon them, extinguishing their fire, and nearly filling up the cave. "Puddin's and panches, what's this o'it?" roared the Baronet, in consternation. "Good heavens! 'tis the fall of an avalanche from above," replied the youth. "Help us a'! then we are buried alive!" "Not unless it is all the more extensive," cried Richard, hopefully. "We must cut our way up."

Fortunately for them there was a spade in the cavern, and with this Richard set to work to tunnel a path through the snow, which lay in a mighty heap in front of their abode. It was a slow and laborious operation, for the snow as it was detached had to be carried inward and heaped up in every available space. The youth and Sir Gilbert labored all that day, and night found them utterly exhausted, without their having penetrated to the outer air.

That night they had to spend in the other compartment, beside the animals, and after a few hours' repose they were up again and at work.

After three hours more of incessant toil, a dim light began to be discernible at the far end of their tunnel. This animated them with new strength, and as it was Sir Gilbert who was at the time using the spade, he made a rush with it against the snow wall.

The result was unexpected and confounding. He burst bodily through the snow, as an equestrian in a circus bursts through a paper hoop, and, blinded by the light of day into which he suddenly emerged, he rolled over and over down the slope till he stuck fast in the hollow, and his exclamation of "Puddin's and panches" was smothered in the utterance.

The Baronet lay for a moment motionless in his snowy lair, then he started up and looked round bewildered.

Richard and Helen were standing at the opening of the cave, and looking down upon him in breathless anxiety.

"Hurrah!" he shouted, at the utmost pitch of his voice. "Hurrah, ye buffers, we are free—puddin's and panches, we are free!"

And free they were in a double sense, for the south wind which had blown for the last forty hours had cleared away the snow as if by magic, and the green tops of the hills were revealed; in the hollows alone the wreaths still lay to some depth.

The sun shone brightly in a blue sky, and the balmy breath of the freshened air was grateful in the extreme to the released captives.

CHAPTER XXIX.—THE PRISONER OF THE BASS—UNLOOKED FOR VISITORS—RICHARD WAYLAND ARRESTED FOR THE MURDER OF JABEZ CRINGAN.

The snow storm which passed away so rapidly from the Ochils vanished as suddenly from other districts of Scotland, and proved to be the last of that winter's triumphs of power. The south wind which chased it away was the harbinger of an early and genial spring, and within a week of the first breath of its subduing influence the landscape fresh and near presented that exquisite green hue which the earth exhibits only in the spring months.

It was a marvellous transformation scene, and as welcome as it was marvellous. The imagination felt it difficult to realise the fact that but one short week ago that bleak and wintry desolation reigned over these hills and vales now so fair and verdant, and, instead of that soft and balmy southern breeze she keen cutting northwind swept the uplands, and howled like an insatiable beast of prey in the valleys and among the bare trees. Yet so it was, and thousands of human hearts rejoiced in the presage of a cheering and revivifying spring whose advent was so swift and unlooked-for.

It carried its blissful influence everywhere and in no place perhaps was the change so marked or so appreciated as on the lonely and gloomy island of the Bass, which stood then as it stands still, amid the surging waters of the Forth, presenting its steep and lofty point to the far stretching German ocean.

In winter time a more dreary and dismal residence than the Bass Rock can hardly be conceived. Standing some two miles from the land, its bare and rocky-top rising six hundred feet above the ocean, it is fully exposed to every blast, and its dark rugged sides for ever bear the tossing of the ocean's angry waves, which dash against them unceasingly with thunderous sound. Direct from the frozen north the frosty wind flies across the deep, and smites its rugged sides now named and scarred by the storms of centuries, but still raised in proud defiance and lonely grandeur in the face of all the fierce assaults.

At the time of which we write this lonely sea-surrounded crag had been made the "Palm of the persecuted." Previously a place of strength, its dungeons, buildings, and fortifications admirably fitted it for the cruel purposes of the rulers who turned it into a place of captivity for the faithful adherents of the Covenant, and immersed in its damp unwholesome cells many faithful ministers who would not cease to speak in their Master's name, but in the face of Council edicts preached in the fields and among the moors and in this contumacious were subjected to fines, bonds, and imprisonment.

CANADIANS IN GEORGIA.—The following extract is taken from a late Savannah paper:—"A pleasant episode in the ordinary routine of court cases occurred to-day, by the presence of two high English functionaries in the United States District Court Rooms. These were the Hon. W. H. Draper, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Canada, and the Hon. W. G. Draper, District Judge of Ontario, Canada. Being in Savannah on a little tour of relaxation, they were admitted to seats on either side of Judge Erskine. After the usual courtesies on the Bench they were introduced to the members of the bar, by whom they were received with kindly greeting. The interview was one of the most pleasant kind. The incident may be thought unimportant, but these friendly greetings tend much to promote good feelings between the subjects or citizens of two great and honorable nations."

RESPONSIBILITY OF MUNICIPALITIES.—A very important case has just been decided at the Assizes for Elgin, at St. Thomas. In February last year, a man named John Sanders Bulkwell, was killed on a public road in Southwold township, by being thrown out of his sleigh, in consequence of the bad state of the road, and was killed. His widow brought an action for damages against the township, and the jury gave her a verdict for $1,750—it being held that the municipality was responsible for all accidents occurring on the highways over which they have control.

Among the obituary notices of a country paper, we recently noticed the following:—"Mr. _____, of Malvern, aged eighty three, passed peacefully away, on Tuesday evening last, from single blessedness to matrimonial bliss, after a short but sudden attack by Mrs. _____, a blooming widow of thirty-five.
