Sixteenth Century.

CHAPTER XLVIII.—THE VEILED LADY.
JESSICA.—Who are you? Tell me for more certainty.
ALBERT.—I swear that I do know your tongue.
LO.—Lorenzo, and thy love.
JESSICA.—Lorenzo, and thy love indeed.
LO.—For who love I so much? And now who knows
But you, Lorenzo, whether I am yours?
LO.—Heaven and thy thoughts are witness that thou art.

In discussing his affairs with the warm-hearted but punctilious Lindsay, Gilbert had carefully studied every expression of the sentiment which was most powerful in determining him to marry in Scotland until he had encountered Barras, and by overcoming him in arms had proven himself an honest man, in accordance with the creed which they, and till a much later period prevailed, that victory was only vouchsafed to him whose cause was just.

His own disgrace he felt keenly, for it effectually barred the way to all further progress in his native land. But he felt still more keenly the consciousness that he had been the unhappy cause of bringing into question the good name of a fair lady, to whom, as he himself expressed it, he was already indebted too much in simple gratitude for the kindness she had shown him. When he had no friend to help him, she, unsolicited, had opened the way for him to fortune. Thrice she had snatched him from the jaws of death—once at the boldest risk of her own reputation; and now that reputation was sullied by the discovery of her favour.

"The world shall know," he said to himself with teeth clenched and brow knit, "that I am guilty only of possessing a too gentle heart, which has elected the small service I rendered her into boon beyond recompense. Ay, sweet mistress, they shall know that you are good and pure and loyal, else I shall not live to know that for my sake you have been shamed."

Even had not his sense of gratitude urged him to her defence, another and still more powerful sentiment would have made him her champion. There was no use mincing the matter any longer, the feeling he had suspected, doubted, and almost feared, had obtained admission to his breast. He loved her with his whole heart and soul. He thought, with a sheepish blush, of the passion with which he had regarded Mistress Spence, and believed to be love.

It was the overwhelming passion for Mistress Mary which he no longer attempted to disguise to himself that had given the impulse for the present slight refreshment and had made to the warning note, and the passion seemed rather to gain strength the more he endeavored to subdue it by assuring himself that it was hopeless and must be put aside. "The more he resolved that once he had placed her in safety and settled with Barras, he would quit Scotland and return no more until he had conquered his misplaced love, the weaker he felt himself to carry out the resolution.

At the St. Andrew's Rest he readily obtained the use of a couple of hacks, and a small piece of silver placed one of the grooms entirely at his service for that night. He then put on a new suit of clothes, and prepared himself to while away the time till vesper in the best manner possible. He was obliged to sit in the common room, which, as the afternoon advanced, became pretty well occupied by civilians and soldiers.

The afternoon was dull and foggy, and the lowering sky seemed to promise a storm before many hours had passed. This, though unpleasant, was certainly propitious for the project which Gilbert had in view, for under the screen of the fog he might easily escape from the city with his fair prize and defy pursuit.
He stopped at one of the booths which covered the side of ancient St. Giles', and were known as the Kames. The one in which he stopped was in the occupation of a tailor, and a stout dame who stood at the door advertised the passengers with a shrill, shrill voice and a coaxing tone, that whatever was needed for the attire of a brave gentleman or a bonnie lady might be had within at a moderate cost. Dame Skirrowell was a notable woman amongst her neighbors, for, albeit her guileless, Sander, led the most henpecked of lives, by her courtesy to customers she added to his trade, and was ultimately the main instrument in making him deacon of his craft.

TO BE CONTINUED.
A YOUNG RAKE.—A young fellow by the name of Maurice F., a native of Pesth, has broken twenty tender female hearts in Vienna. The young rake promised to marry all of these women, some of whom were not seventeen, while others were over forty years old. He seduced four-fifths of them, borrowed all the money they had, and then left the city. But the police pursued and caught him, and he is now in jail in Vienna. He is only nineteen years old.

The violent deaths in New York city average one thousand per annum, and coroners' fees amount to $26,000 yearly.
