ANNABEL THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXX. COUS MEETING—THE SMENT IN DANGES.

He lay survaying with ransure the grandeur and beauty of this extensive prospect, of discrent in teature from an English landscape, and as suggestive of interesting thoughts connected with the present and the future, when his attention was arrested by a strong guttural examination from Hawkeys, the had convided away to the top of a cliff somewhat in advance of where Philip lay, and where, half-concealed by the brushwood, he lay eagerly peering down towards a point of the river which Philip loud not see from the place he occupied. While the latter had been absorbed in contemplation of the beauties of the scene, the indian, less slive to the influence of mature, had been bent only in discharging the duty which had brought them hither. That he had made some important discovery was evident, both from the exclumation which had escaped him and from the keen, eager attitude with which he bent forward to gaze into the valley below. Philip therefore lost an time in creeping towards him, when so sooner was he by his side than he saw what cause the young brave had for the excitement, which even his phlegmatic nature could not suppress.

In a creek to the west of the settlement, and hidden from it by a bend of the river and the dense forest, the war party of Chichasawa had landed from their cances, which were drawn up on the beech. Their purpose was evident. They were waiting till night came, when in the darkness they would attack the settlement, and as the Indian policy is to surprise and take unawares, they were carefully keeping out of view in the hollow by the river, so that their intended victims might not be aware of the presence.

How completely this artifice was succeeding Philip had learned by the sense of security under which the occupants of the settlement were strangling about their enclosure, and outside of it in the fields were their cattle roamed, dreaming not of the settlement were strangling about their enclosure, and outside of it in the fields were their cattle roamed, dreaming not of the settlement were cyc finshed and his chest heaved with in-ward excitement.

Hawkeye's watchful glance was not un-observant of the young man's emotion, and fearing lest itmight lead him to do something by which the attention of the Chickasses's would be drawn to thom, he silently motioned to him to draw cautious-ly back from the edge of the cliff, that they might speed down the hill to Thun-derdood with news of what they had

Philip felt it hard work to keep abreast of his companion as they went down the slope. The agility which Hawkeye displayed in leasing from rock to rock and bush to bush was such as Philip felt it difficult to imitate, but he scorned to be outdone by a "savage," and boldly followed him wherever he led, taking the same daving lans without a moment's hesitaod him wherever he led, taking the same daring leaps without a moment's hesitation, and landing with him at length in the hollow where Thundercloud and his warriors lay. Leaving Hawkeye to give information to the chief, Philip sought Steive and Jim, and communicated to them the same tidings.

"Wall, I guess Thundercloud had best lose no time in making tracks," observed the trapper, as he rose and shook himself. "It ain't just next door we have to go, and them Chickasaws mean to make the burst as soon as ever it's dark enough."

the burst as soon as ever it's dark conough."

It was not, however, until considerably after sunset that Thundercloud resumed the march. The interval was spent by the Indians in renewing the frightful red paint upon their bodies, in pluming their head feathers, looking to their bows and arrows, and sharpening their tomahawks. These things they did with an expression of fiendish anticipation, and not the least carefully looked to portion of their accountements were their wanpum belts, which were prepared to receive the scalps of the Chickasaws whom they should capture or slay.

Few Propte unacquainted with physiological chemistry are aware of the quantity of iron in the blood, but all should know the importance of keeping up the supply, for debility, disease and death are sure to follow when the quantity becomes too much reduced. The Peruvian Syrap (a protoxide of Iron) supplies this vital element, and has cured many chronne diseases.
