CANADIAN DESPATCHES IN BRIEF.

Voting on the Scott act takes place in ought to have kept them for his own congregation, and not to introduce that whilst he "would not say one word to weaken the Christain's hope" he would say "that salvation through faith in Christ was not the truth?"

Now if Canon Innis holds such views, he ought to have kept them for his own congregation, and not to introduce the "would not say one word to weaken the Christain's hope" he would say "that salvation ought to have kept them for his own congregation, and not to introduce that whilst he "would not say one word to weaken the Christain's hope" he would say "that salvation ought to have kept them for his own congregation, and not to introduce the christain's hope." gregation, and not to intrude them upon a congregation that, he most be well aware, have been taught differently, and who have been too well instructed to be carried away by the voice of a stranger. In this age of rationalism and Thomasism too much care cannot be taken to guard the pulpit from the intrusion of erratic and giddy-minded preachers who scruple not to unsettle the tianity which they have been taught from their youth up, and which bears on their face the imprint of God's word.

Montreal Spectator: There is no annexation sentiment abroad in Canada. New York Telegram: Sir John A. Macdonald, the Canadian premier, condemns independence. That is only natural. Quebec Chronicle: We do not think in-dependence will come at once; it may be far off, still it is an idea which has some shrewd he may be in business.

Montreal Star: There is an inconsistency in Sir John A. Macdonald's remarks at Toronto. He is a great man, a keen statesman, a successful politician, but if he had gone one step further and pronounced in favor of that home rule he proposes by insisting on our right to make our own commercial treaties, then indeed he would have carried the heart of the nation and not the gizzard of a party alone.
