The Sanctum.

With many fears and apprehensions the editors entered upon their duties in October last; now with the consciousness at least of having done our best we give place to others. We desire to express our thanks to all who have aided us in our work during the year. The one suggestion which we would make is, that all the students take a more thorough interest in providing for the literary pages of the Athenæum. The editors sometimes feel that they are overworked in this respect, and it would certainly add to the interest of our paper if a wider distribution of labour were introduced, the editors acting as supervisors, instead of being compelled to produce most of the articles published. We notice that our exchanges contain letters and briefs on all subjects of college interest, sent in for publication by the students in general. This awakens greater interest in the paper itself as well as in the features of college life and work discussed. We would suggest to our successors that steps be taken to secure this condition of affairs. Subjects might be distributed among the students who have a genius for writing and a disposition to help. Thanking subscribers, contributors, friends who have given words of encouragement, one and all, we retire from the work so confidently entrusted to our care.
