placently. "You gave me a pretty fright; why didn't you let me know you were going?"
"Hadn't time. But," said Tom, "I'll relieve you. I went on the very business you think I neglected. Shadow, who keeps very close to Fountain's man—his valet—and worms everything out of him, came to me hastily before I was out of bed a few days ago, with the informa tion that Fountain had been summoned to Newport, after considerable tele graphic correspondence with the Ashmiss Dollie Brown, aged 71, died while grove girl. "Take it easy, my boy, it is not to be told that way. The beauty of telling a tale is telling it in a sequential manner; you make your points much stronger, and a clearer understanding is the re-

"Oh, go on your own way," returned Holbrook, irritably, realizing that Tom was not to be driven and that interruption only delayed the course of his nar rative. "Well, then, as I traveled on I had time to examine the reasons laying back of my impulse. Of course, if Fountain went to Newport he would go to Witherspoon's. That several telegrams had passed between himself and the Ashgrove girl, and that Fountain had expressed a desire to remain in New York a few days longer and had yielded in obedience to the last telegram from Newport, showed urgency. Now, what urgency, and why? That was what I was traveling to Newport to find out if "I should take it a very poor reason," interrupted Holbrook. "The idea of traveling off so many miles upon an impulse."

"My dear fellow, your inability to appreciate how controlling such impulses are upon some temperaments, shows me newspaper man. I make it a rule of life Hence my success.'

"Well, get on with your story." "After a while I thought I would open my bag and find what I had with me, and to my surprise I discovered a suit of clothes for a laboring man—a working suit. Then I remembered that I had used it as a disguise some time ago when I was on another affair, and the thought popped into my head that I could use it again, possibly to good effect. After I got to Newport I made my way to the Witherspoon cottage and took in the surroundings. I knew what time Fountain was to leave New York, and, therefore, about what time he would

"I determined to disguise myself as a gardener, get on the grounds, and risk detection. So procuring a pair of garden shears, I did my working clothes up in a package, smugged it out of the hotel, and on a plausible pretext secured a room in a cottage in the town, where I could make the change. About the only thing I learned on the stage was expertness in make up, and when I issued from the room I was as fit a gardener as you ever saw. I loitered around until about the time for his arrival. I was near the gates when the carriage drove up, and quickly followed it. Fortunately for me, such as were at work on the grounds-were in front and not in the rear."

"Oh, do skip the details, for heaven's sake!" cried Holbrook. "You seem to be nervous this morning," rejoined Tom, who, between a desire to tease Holbrook and an intense relish in his own tale, was indulging his vein of graphic recital. "Well, I saw the Ashgrove girl waiting for him, saw her greet him, and then sit down and wait for him while he entered the house. Shortly he came out again, and I had an opportunity to get close up to the veran-da out of sight, on the pretext of trimming some vines. Then there began the most extraordinary conversation." Tom here detailed that scene upon the veranda, of which the reader is fully ininformed. During its recital Tom was not interrupted; Holbrook was too anxious and interested to lose a word.

When he had finished Holbrook said:

"That settles it. Fountain is the man."

"True, but I think his exhibition of firmness and self possession at the clut was even greater than on the veranda."

"Why, on the veranda he was sure of the girl, he could depend on her love for him; but in the club an intimation that he was the murderer, backed by proof or strong suspicion, would have made each man there an enemy."
"True," commented Holbrook. "But

"True," commented Holorook. "But Floral How that girl does love! It is a wild, unreasoning, an all pervading love —a love sacrificing everything. I could not have believed it of her." "Come, tell me," said Tom, "of your doings since I've been gone."

with her permission had examined all the personal effects of the deceased. He had found letters in plenty, both at the office of Templeton and his boarding place, but non-that threw any light upon the motive of the deed or which even demanded inquiry.

The books and business papers were in excellent and methodical shape. He was certain after closing everything up to the property of th and paying all outstanding obligations he could turn over something above thirty thousand dollars to be added to the fortune of Mrs. Templeton. The greater part of this money was already in government bonds deposited in a safety vault. The ladies were comfortably situated in Lexington avenue, and he saw them nearly nightly.

He had been over to see old George

Dolwell on Long Island, and had conversed with him as to Wessing's visit. Little had come of that visit. Wessing had not been by any means communicative, had advoitly avoided direct answer-to direct questions, and had tried to draw upon Dolwell for recollection of the pa-pers of Pierson when in the office. As these principally related to litiga-tion over the collecting of business debts,

"Ah!" cried Tom, "that is getting warm. What was Dolwell's reply?" "No, upon the contrary he had every reason to believe he had not; he had first known of Mr. Pierson twenty-five years ago, and he then bore that name, and was known as a reputable merchant."

"This thing is very perplexing," remarked Tom thoughtfully. "I cannot make out the connection. Wessing is here making inquiries with regard to be the Building adjoining the N. B. Irading Co's Office, Water St.

"Tom, the case stands like this. Now Dimensions Pine Lumber follow me closely: Templeton is murdered in the open streets and there is no apparent motive for the deed. Circum stances, wholly arising from Flora Ash-grove's manner and words, point the way to suspicions of Fountain." "Good, I follow you." "As soon as we set inquiry on foot we run against the dead Pierson. Wessing inquires for his papers, so does Fountain."

"Yes, and so does Parker."
"Oh, that is nothing: he is an attorney. probably acting for one or other of them. Don't interrupt me, you destroy the continuity of my thought. To get back—so does Fountain. Now, in the talk between Flora and Fountain, overheard by you, there are three points made—first, Fountain is an illegitimate son; second, he is proposing to engage upon an enter-prise in the following of which is in-volved the exposure of his illegitimacy third, Providence has removed Temple ton from his path."

"Oh, ho, I begin to see your drift." "Now to weave these facts. Let us make some suppositions. Suppose Pierson was one of those men who, having a fair and reputable business exterior, who were taken and reputable pusiness exterior, lived a double or even triple private life. This is not a wild supposition—there are plenty of such instances; the records of the courts are full of them.
