HOFF'S MALT EXTRACT.
It is on my return home from one of my Christmas holidays that in passing through Birmingham I found the manager of the theatre there (which my father had relinquished on entering on his Manchester speculation) had sent tickets for a box.
Concluding it proper that the civility should be acknowledged by the appearance of some of our family, I went with one of my sisters and a friend, "Richard, the Favourite!" was the large lettered attraction of the play!
The play was "The Body," very well acted, and the street scene a masterpiece on the part of "Mister and Imogene." Richard represented the "all covered with jewels and gold," a female portrait, playing the name of Watson, being the manager's wife, a little man-looking man, in a shabby green suit dress (I remember him well) appeared as the hero of "Antonio the Brave." It was ridiculous that the only impression I carried away was that the hero and heroine were the worst in the play. How little I knew, or could guess, that under that shabby green suit was the grandly distinguished, the ordinary genius that has ever illustrated the dramatic poetry of England!
When some years afterwards I returned I was excited to the highest pitch by the appearance at Drury Lane of an actor of the name of Kean, only distinguished easily by conceiving, on discovering that the little insignificant "Antonio the Brave" was the grandly distinguished predecessor of Otello, Richard, and Shylock.
