

Anniversary - 1983

University opened its doors on 23 Sept. 1908, but didn't move to its present site until 1911, when the South (now St. Stephen's) became the focus of campus life. In 1911, Athabasca Hall was still under construction.

Forty-seven students registered for full or partial courses during the year. No University in the history of Canada began its career with so large a number of students... president's report 1908-09.

Years of effort by many members... some problems during the opening

The Wauneta Room in the Arts building. The society was made up of all women students organized under a Cree motto, which once translated meant; all for one and one for all.

This business of the tuck, you know, has a most insidious way of worming its way into your good graces and then laughing at you when, toward the end of the month, you begin sending frantic appeals home for money... Gateway, November 29, 1920.

Sports lives on in its various forms on Campus. The venues have changed and the players of yesteryear are the leaders of today.

One of the first institutions established on campus was the Gateway. The paper had teething problems as it couldn't publish in its second year due to lack of funding and a shortage of staff because of typhoid fever.
