

"Protection" For Your Home— No "Free Trade" With Decay.

Everything with a surface needs surface protection. Not only the outside of your home, but every part of the inside—the floors, walls, furniture, woodwork and metal parts.

To paint, means protection and preservation and money saved on repairs, for wear and decay always start at the surface.

To leave a surface unprotected by paint or varnish, means "free trade" with decay and waste.

THE FRENCH CHARACTER.

The Clarity of Their Minds Assured the World.

It is a commonplace to say that the war has revolutionized all our notions of the French people. Most of us had thought them frivolous, light-minded, unstable. Under the supreme test of war we found them precisely the reverse.

The tactics of Joffre and Foch, in contrast to those of the German General Staff, show an illumination on the French character. Lendit, a just appreciation of a complicated situation, characterized the French strategy. Throughout the war the French had a more nearly accurate view of what they could do and what their opponents could do than the Germans had. The Germans rushed for Paris, then for the channel ports, then for Verdun, finally again for Paris, each time they tried too much. Each time the French threw them back, and on two occasions, at the beginning and end of the war, waiting for the right moment with supreme self-control, turned the repulse into disaster.

Mrs. Edith Wharton discusses French characteristics in the Cosmopolitan. She holds the nation as a whole, the same temple, which we have spoken of as revealed in the war. The Frenchman prefers to face all the facts of life in the open. Eccentricities do not appeal to him. He sets up standards and conforms to them. If the French Academy makes its decision in matters literary, he accepts it. He has a just appreciation of scientific and cultural leadership. Mrs. Wharton remarks that the same audience that goes to the movie in Paris will stand in line to get tickets for a classic play.

Philip G. Hammetton has made a somewhat similar observation. The French peasant, he insists, is more alert, more intelligent than the man of similar station in England. The nation has an instinct for taste, for culture, for social intercourse. Matthew Arnold has contrasted it with other nations, remarking that the English-speaking people are rather absorbed in conduct, the German in things of the intelligence (a generation later he would have said in world conquest of trade) and the Italian in the beautiful.

The clarity of the French mind is famous. Indeed, it has proved troublesome to the French nation, for it has led to a disregard of the anchorage of habit which other peoples have found so useful. The French Revolution attempted to root out all illogical habits, and reduce everything, including God, to the decimal system. Such a process is rather severe on the discenter.

The general French standard of judgment, which has little tolerance for curious medical cults and other departures from normal, is attributed by W. O. Brownell—whose book, "French Traits," is probably the keenest piece of national criticism extant—to a thorough-going respect for public opinion. When the signers of the Declaration of Independence set forth "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind" as prompting them to issue the declaration, they were taking a typically French attitude. When Richard Lovelace wrote the famous lines:

"I could not love thee, dear, so much Loved I not honor more,"

he was speaking the natural sentiment of a Frenchman. Carlyle somewhere tells of the Scottish Covenanters appealing to what shall he say? And the Frenchman interrupts with, "To posterity." In other words, the Frenchman cannot think of any better appeal than to the future enlightened judgment of mankind.

That standard is not the Anglo-Saxon standard. But it has its advantages. Certainly the events of the war have shown that a nation with a passion for common sense has a wonderful endowment with which to meet the stresses of life.

The bride wore a dress of white silk, with a beautifully arranged, full veil and carried a bouquet of lovely roses and maiden hair fern. Little Kathleen DeWitt, niece of the bride was flower girl and looked very sweet in pale blue silk and carried a basket of flowers. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Harrison and the wedding march was rendered by Miss Emma DeWitt, immediately after the ceremony, which took place in the parlor, decorated in green and white, luncheon was served in the dining room, the table having yellow daffodils, prettily arranged.
