The story she had heard would probably change the whole course of her life.

"Red Delilah" was the sister to whom the Count de Montalt had referred, and the girl's new and latest fear was that the story which he had told her yesterday was gathered in part at first hand; that he knew from personal contact with her sisterwhose proper name was Daphnesome of the facts which he had included in the tale which he had told

CHAPTER XII. TOM CHERITON'S SUSPICIONS.

Daphne Marlow, or Nurse Morland s she called herself was in the inrmary of an industrial town in the orth-east of Yorkshire-a six or ven hours' ride from London. Dessie would have to remain away a east one night, therefore, and cerinly to give some explanation of er absence to Mrs. Markham.

Moreover, Tom Cheriton was comsaid to him as well. That she should tell the facts to either of then was out of the question; and the difficulty was what to say. She re solved, of course, to wire short mes sages to both; and to send a letter in addition to Tom. She went to Victoria ia Station, because that might help to keep them all off the trail; as he

Northern line from King's Cross. To Mrs. Maykham she wired that ousiness commission had been give her suddenly, and she could not b back that night, and possibly not th next. To Cheriton she sent two wires The first to his uncle's house i Staffordshire, asking him not to com to town that day if he had not al eady started. The second to Mrs Markham's house, saying an urgen

It was an incoherent letter: by she had not time to attempt to rewrite it; so she dropped it into the etter box, breathing fervent prayer that after all, the parting was only for a day or so, and that she might yet be able to explain everything. Then she travelled by the District Railway to King's Cross, and was soon speeding northward in the express, turning over and over in her mind all the events which in a few days had made up this wild whirl of change in her life; and speculating what would be the outcome of this interview with her sister, whom she had not seen for six years, and whose safety she was now perhaps going to purchase at the cost of both happiness and honor.
